Mr. TILLMAN. What is the difference in effect—I do not mean the technical, legal effect, but in actuality—between "designated" and "appointed?" The Senator is too fair a man to deny——

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I am willing the Senator should ask the question, but I would a little prefer to answer it myself. The Senator ought to know——

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator always quibbles, however, if I may use that word, in some of his answers. I do not say that offensively.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has used the word "quibbles." He did not intend it to be offensive——

Mr. TILLMAN. No, indeed.

Mr. SPOONER. But it is.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will take it back, and I will ask the Senator to correct me if I am wrong. It is the old Saxon that will come up, and I am obliged to use a word that conveys my exact meaning. I do not want to use the word "dodge"—another Saxon word—and therefore I am at a loss as to what to say, unless I were to get a thesaurus or use some word that would be Latinized, perhaps——

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator ought to apologize for his apology. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I will do that. I am willing to do almost anything in a friendly way for the Senator, because he has got a very hard case to prove this afternoon. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. I gave the Senator up some time ago, Mr. President. I do not expect him to see it as I see it, but I am perfectly frank in what I say. I see it as I state it, and I stand by it as I state it.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the difference between "designated" and "appointed," in your opinion?

Mr. SPOONER. When the President of the United States sends the name of a person here for a particular office, he does not appoint him.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; he does not get his commission.

Mr. SPOONER. The President does not appoint him; he designates him; he nominates him. If the Senate "advises and consents," and the commission is signed, the appointment is complete.

Mr. TILLMAN. And Mr. Morales took our place in this transaction.

Mr. SPOONER. The commission, Mr. President, is not the appointment; it is evidence of the appointment. When Morales says in this decree that the person designated by the President is to be appointed by him, if he is satisfactory, the Senator ought to be able to understand it without assistance. The Senator is an able man, and, in good faith, apart from his feelings, he would not need to ask me for information as to the distinction between "designated" and "appointed" as used in this decree. "Designated" meant in this decree "recommended."

3. The residue, being the amount to be devoted to the payment of the debts, shall be immediately deposited in some New York bank to be designated by the President of the United States, to remain in deposit for the benefit of—

of all the creditors of the Republic, both Dominican and foreign, and shall not be drawn out until the Dominican Congress—

That is the test—

shall not be drawn out until the Dominican Congress and the Senate of the United States shall have taken action in regard to the pending convention.

Whose money is that, Mr. President? If the treaty to-morrow were ratified, who would draw out that money? The United States would distribute it in equitable proportions, according to the terms of the treaty, among the creditors found by us, through commissioners or by agreement, to be entitled to it. That can not happen until the treaty is ratified. We would then hold the money as trustee and be entitled to its custody. We are not so in any sense to-day. If day after to-morrow the Senate, in its wisdom, shall reject the treaty, whose money is it? It remains the money of Santo Domingo, to be drawn out of that bank by Santo Domingo. We would have no more right to draw it, no more right to touch it, than I would have or the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] would have.

And yet this situation is said to be "putting in operation the treaty!" Here is the heart and test of the whole question that I have come to now. There is no escape from it. It is beyond reach of any bedevilment. One can not by "sticking in the bark," or misreading a word here and a word there in the President's order or in Morales's decree, obscure this crucial point. If Morales had had no communication with the President; if the Dawson dispatch had never been received, and the proposal in it never made; if no foreign creditors had brought pressure, and there had not been danger of domestic disturbance, and Morales had sent the money to New York, collected by Americans selected by himself or by the Santo Domingans, and deposited it to the credit of Santo Domingo in the bank, the situation in substance and essence would have been what it is to-day. Reading the documents as a whole, as one must do, makes it too plain for escape. If the treaty were ratified the money would not be transferred by the bank in New York to the credit of the United States, trustee, without the further action of the Santo Domingo Government, to whose credit it stands.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. In a moment I will yield to the Senator; I am not quite through.

4. If the final determination of the Congress of the Dominican Republic and the Senate of the United States shall be favorable to the pending convention, the moneys deposited shall be distributed among the creditors, in proportion to their just credits, in accordance with the terms of the said convention.

If the Senate shall ratify the treaty, the money shall be distributed by the United States in accordance with its terms; and yet it is claimed here that the President has ratified the treaty and is actually putting it in force. Nor is that all.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SPOONER. In a moment; not in the middle of a sentence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. SPOONER (reading)—

If the determination of the aforesaid Congress and Senate should be averse—

What then?

the said moneys shall be at the disposition of—the Dominican Government for equitable distribution among the creditors, in accordance with the terms of such agreement as IT shall make with them.

Whom?—

Does the Senator see?

Mr. TILLMAN. Now will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin now yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has labored——

Mr. SPOONER. If I am laboring it is because I am tired.

Mr. TILLMAN. Most eloquently, and employed all of the——

Mr. SPOONER. "Sophistry and special pleading."

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I am going to say something sweet and nice [laughter]—all the resources at the command of his great and brilliant intellect and his long experience as a lawyer. But he has never had as bad a case as this that he ever won [laughter], and he will not win this because the facts are known to all men who care to read that while the final disposition of the money, the million dollars collected by Colonel Colton and deposited in the New York banks, has not yet been made, and that under the temporary arrangement, in case the treaty is rejected, it shall return to Santo Domingo, where it would belong, because it would be none of ours—the Senator can not deny that practically, to all intents and purposes, in the appointment of Colonel Colton and his subordinates, or their nomination, or other designation, or whatever you choose to term it, in the presence of gunboats there to protect these officers in the collection of those customs, in the implied notice or direct notice to all——

Mr. SPOONER. "How long, O Lord, how long?" [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, it is entirely relevant, even if I say it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, it is not that, but I am anxious to get through.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will stop right there if the Senator cuts me off in that way.

Mr. SPOONER. I can not cut the Senator off.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator ought not to get so restive under the spur when I have got a good chance at him—and it is not often that I get such a chance—but I want to say to the Senator that I believe his honesty of heart will not enable him to deny that the conditions of the treaty are to-day being carried out, not finally, but so far as getting the money, so far as preserving the status quo, so far as warning the war ships of European powers to keep away, so far as notice to creditors that their claims will be adjudicated, and all that is concerned, the treaty is in effect and is being carried out by the President, notwithstanding the fact that the Senate of the United States has not ratified it.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina chooses to put it in that way to me, availing himself of my permission to interrupt me, he may do so. It is a customary thing for the Senator, who has some great qualities, to meet a frank statement or argument by me with the suggestion that I am a lawyer; that I am habituated, or have been during my life, to the skillful and ingenious presentation of a client's case, implying that I bring to the discharge of the duties of a Senator, under oath, all the ardor and the ingenuity and the characteristics of the advocate. If the Senator from South Carolina is right about that it would give me very great pain and mortification. If, after having worked here, Mr. President, for fifteen years as a Senator, I were incapable of dealing frankly and as I find the truth to be, with my associates, if I could be a mere ingenious advocate in defense of a President, forgetting the honor which my people conferred upon me more than once, twice without my asking, in the confidence that when I reached the Senate I would think of them and my duty to the country, I should feel that my career here, of which I am not any too proud, had been a pitiful failure. The Senator means no discourtesy, much less insult, when he tells me at the end of a tedious and wearisome, both to you and to me, presentation of what I think is the only view which can be taken of this transaction, that I do not mean it, that it is the specious advocacy of a trained lawyer rather than the frank, honest, manly statement of a gentleman.

The Senator has said that more than once during this debate. I say to him now I do not think he appreciates its significance, nor do I think that, appreciating its significance, he would say it. I believe the Senator means to do what is right as a Senator. We disagree often. I am not suspicious of him. I resent suspicion of myself, and I utter to the Senate my best thought upon public questions.

Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt that in this transaction—the papers show it, the knowledge of what occurred at its initiative prove it—there was not only no purpose to put in operation this paper, not a treaty, but nothing has been done which looks like it except that in the decree of Morales and in the cablegram from Santo Domingo 45 and 55 per cent, the proportions with which the treaty dealt, are fixed. That is natural, and no ground for challenge.

Why not be square with the President of the United States as we expect him and every other honest man to be with us? It is no light thing in this body, related as it is to the Executive, again and again or at all to impute to the President an act of violent usurpation, of which he would have been guilty if he had attempted to carry out a proposed treaty pending and unacted upon in the Senate of the United States. If he has, without usurpation, by a friendly office, invoked by Morales, bad as he may be, but speaking for Santo Domingo, led to the appointment of good men in Santo Domingo to honestly collect the revenue, and if by the presence of our war ships pending our long vacation he has maintained the situation to greet our return and to abide the action of this body, he is entitled to credit for it and not to criticism.

Mr. President, a few words in a general way about the Santo Domingo treaty, and I shall have finished. I wish there were no occasion to deal with it at all. On the general principle I am as radical as any Senator on the other side. But I differentiate Santo Domingo from the South American republics. I do not think differently from many others upon the proposition that the United States shall become the receiver of bankrupt nations to the south of us. Nor am I considering, either, the Monroe doctrine in connection with it, or the Panama Canal. With me, neither has to do with it in this connection. It is an unique case. It is nearly a hundred years now since Santo Domingo became a separate government. It has had a hundred years of irredeemably bad history from almost every standpoint.

Mr. TILLMAN. I may be mistaken, but from my reading Toussaint L'Ouverture is the only one who ever governed the country as a whole, and when he died it fell apart, one part French and the other Spanish.

Mr. SPOONER. It has been a pitiful record. It is an island of great richness and fertility. The people have suffered cruelly. There are good people there. Among their leading men, I am told, there are many able and good men. It would be difficult to imagine otherwise. They have been the prey of foreign usurers and of domestic blackmailers and revolutionists. Colonel Colton, in his statement before the committee, says: "When General Grant wanted to take the island in 1871, their entire indebtedness did not exceed sixteen hundred thousand dollars." I have regretted since this subject arose that the country did not take Santo Domingo when General Grant so impressed upon the Senate and upon the people the importance of it. Its population was small, and I do not know how others felt about it, but during the Spanish-American war I did not relish the notion that the ports of Santo Domingo were neutral ports, and men along the southern coast did not relish it either. There were thousands in our southern cities affrighted by the "phantom fleet," believed to be hovering along our coasts, who would have been delighted if they could have known that at Samana Bay and in the other harbors of Santo Domingo there were war ships of the United States safeguarding the southern cities from attack, and having a base of supplies and operations which would enable them efficiently to do that thing.

At that time—

Eighteen hundred and seventy-one—

the entire indebtedness of the country did not exceed $1,600,000. Since that time they have collected revenues amounting to a good many millions of dollars, at least thirty, but have not only been unable, from the entire revenues received, to pay their actual running expenses, but they have gone into debt at the rate of about a million dollars a year since 1871. So that when the affairs of the Republic were again the subject of investigation in 1905 it was found in such a state of confusion that its records gave no adequate explanation of its financial condition, but indicated a nominal debt amounting to more than $33,000,000, besides many disputed items and undeveloped claims.

It is believed that their honest debt, instead of being $33,000,000, is less than $10,000,000. Every year has been a year of horror, and it is now within sight of our flag. That is one thing which distinguishes the case from all the rest. It is 90 miles from Porto Rico.

Nor, Mr. President, is that all. There is another element in it which appeals to every man, I think, who stops to consider it, which will distinguish it probably from all to the southward. Santo Domingo asks the United States to do this thing. What? To help her to face the sunrise. To help her work her way out of the darkness. She wants to pay her debts. She can never rehabilitate herself until some one stronger than she investigates these claims, and, having influence with the creditor nations, scales them down to what is honest and right. All they want is to be protected from revolution by an honest collection of revenues until their debt is paid, and they believe that during that period of time the contrast between prosperity and anarchy, between law and peace and bloodshed and violence, will teach that people to prefer the improved condition. To whom else could she apply? We gave her warrant to apply to us. How? When? Where? When we went to war to free Cuba, and, after we had freed her, taught her people by an object lesson in their midst the true theory of government, organized a government and left her, under the resolution of which my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has a right always to be proud, to her people. What other nation has done that? And to us, her neighbor, known all over the world as not only a powerful and rich, but just and generous and liberty loving nation—little Santo Domingo appeals to give her a chance—that is all—for life and peace; not to compel her to pay usurious interest to rascals, not to force her to pay what she does not owe, but to give her a chance. Is there any other case like it? She is a derelict little nation out in the near by sea. Any nation has the right to clear the sea of a derelict. It is a danger.

Is it not on the whole safer and better to extend to her our aid than to turn away from her appeal, with the complications certain to follow? This is a question for every Senator to decide for himself.

I have taken too long. I thank the Senate for its attention.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it had not been my purpose to take part in this debate to-day or at any other time, and I would not do so except for the refusal of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to grant me the courtesy to insert in the RECORD in the time he was speaking a statement of the President of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will pardon me. I did not understand what he said.

Mr. CULBERSON. I stated that it had not been my purpose to take part in the discussion of this question either to-day or at any other time, and I would not have done so had not the Senator from Wisconsin declined to grant me the courtesy to insert in the RECORD a statement of the President of the United States. Even now I propose to detain the Senate but a few moments.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will permit me. I meant no discourtesy to him. I had been interrupted so much that I was weary and was anxious to be through. That is all.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well; I will speak in my own time.

Mr. President, so far as the question of Santo Domingo is concerned, what is it as it presents itself to this body this afternoon, after the Senator from Wisconsin has concluded? The question is whether the President of the United States has not put in operation the subject of the treaty with Santo Domingo before that treaty has been ratified by this body. The Senator from Wisconsin has admitted that the President could not put in operation, could not execute in this manner the treaty which is pending here. Why, Mr. President, could that not be done? Why was it impossible under the Constitution for the President to take this course? Because, sir, the subject-matter of that treaty is one with which he can not deal singly and exclusively, but he must treat it in connection with the Senate of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, if that be true—if that be the case here—what difference is there under the Constitution between carrying the treaty into effect by the President under the terms of the treaty, between doing that and making a separate and independent—partly verbal and partly written—agreement by which he undertakes to do so, by which he undertakes to act upon and to control the subject of the treaty without the consideration and consent of the Senate? Is he doing it, Mr. President? Has the President usurped the power of the Senate and the President under the Constitution to deal with this subject, not only to deal with the subject under the terms and provisions of the treaty, but to deal with the subject at all, without reference to this body?

Now, a moment, because I do not intend at this late hour to keep the Senate long in session upon the pending question. The principal questions dealt with in the treaty, the principal agreements, Mr. President, were that the Government of the United States was to take possession of the custom-house, collect the revenues, pass upon the validity of the debts of Santo Domingo, and then distribute the funds; and I say to you to-day the President is doing everything involved in that treaty which could not be conveniently postponed. What is he doing? The war ships are there protecting the custom-houses. Whatever the subterfuge and sham with which you may surround it, Americans are there in control of the custom-houses and collecting the money, and they are depositing in banks in New York, subject to distribution hereafter, 55 per cent, and paying 45 per cent of it to the Government of Santo Domingo.

Ah, Mr. President, in spite of rhetoric, in spite of undue excitement on the part of anyone, the President has taken into his control and he is exerting the power of the Senate and the President combined over this subject, over every part of it which could not be conveniently postponed, without reference to and in spite of the pendency of the treaty here. Americans are in control of the custom-houses, American war ships are protecting the coast and the ports, Americans are collecting the money and paying 45 per cent to Santo Domingo and depositing 55 per cent in banks in New York.

All I wanted to do when the Senator from Wisconsin reiterated time and again that we were not in possession was to add what the President of the United States himself had said upon the subject, and I am glad to be able to do so now. I place the statement of the President—frank, courageous, truthful, as we all know him to be—I place the statement of the President, in his speech to the people at Chautauqua, N. Y., against any afterthought here or elsewhere.

What did he say? I read from his speech at Chautauqua, N. Y., August 11, 1905, published in the Dallas Morning News of August 12, 1905, being an Associated Press account of his speech, written in the cloister, in his study, thought out, carefully worded, not a synopsis:

> Accordingly the executive department of our Government negotiated a treaty under which we are to try to help the Dominican people to straighten out their finances. This treaty is pending before the Senate, whose consent to it is necessary. In the meantime we have made a temporary arrangement which will last until the Senate has had time to take action upon the treaty. Under this arrangement we see to the honest administration of the custom-houses, collecting the revenues, turning over 45 per cent to the Government for running expenses and putting the other 55 per cent into a safe deposit for equitable division among the various creditors, whether European or American, accordingly as, after investigation, their claims seem just.
> The custom-houses offer well-nigh the only sources of revenue in Santo Domingo, and the different revolutions usually have as their real aim the obtaining possession of these custom-houses. The mere fact that we are protecting the custom-houses and collecting the revenue with efficiency and honesty has completely discouraged all revolutionary movement, while it has already produced such an increase in the revenues that the Government is actually getting more from the 45 per cent that we turn over to it than it got formerly when it took the entire revenue.

That, Mr. President, is all I desired to read when the proffer to do so was declined by the Senator from Wisconsin for reasons which he has explained and which I accept as entirely satisfactory. There is the statement of the President without equivocation, because I understand he does not equivocate, that we have taken possession of the custom-houses, we are collecting the revenue, we are paying 45 per cent to Santo Domingo and depositing the balance in places of safekeeping for future distribution. So in substance and in fact every important feature of the treaty, not as a treaty, but every important act in the treaty, every provision of the treaty, is being carried into effect, though under a different arrangement, except an inquiry into the validity of these debts and the distribution of the 55 per cent which will go to the creditors of the Santo Domingo Government.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think that it is possible for anybody to make any addition to the masterly statement in regard to the powers of the President in treaty making, or as to the condition of the Santo Domingo question, which we have heard from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] this afternoon. But my name has been brought into this debate several times by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and I have also been referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin. I wish, before the debate closes, to say a few words in regard to the Santo Domingo question and the attitude of the President in sending delegates to Algeciras. It is now so late that I will not attempt to address the Senate at this time. With the kind indulgence of the Senate, I will trespass upon their patience by asking permission to address them briefly tomorrow on this same topic immediately after the close of the routine morning business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 24, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 23, 1906.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Territories to report favorably the bill H. R. 12707, commonly known as the "statehood bill."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, from the Committee on Territories, reports the following bill, the title of which the Clerk will read.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], of the Committee on Territories, desires to present the views of the minority.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, printed.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the minority of the Committee on Territories, I present to the House the views of the minority on the statehood bill, and ask that the same be filed and printed with the majority report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee presents the views of the minority, which will also be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

BATTLE MONUMENTS NEAR SANTIAGO, CUBA.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to present the following resolution.

House joint resolution 87.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to employ the United States Army transport Sumner to convey from New York to Santiago de Cuba and return the members of the Santiago Battlefield Commission and the representatives of the President and of the State and War Departments, to enable them to attend the ceremonies to be held at the dedication of the battle monuments at El Caney, Fort San Juan, San Juan Ridge, and San Juan de Mayares Hill, in the immediate vicinity of Santiago de Cuba.

Mr. HULL. I report this resolution by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of my friend from Iowa if this is a unanimous report.

Mr. HULL. I understood there was one vote against it, but no question was reserved on any points of order or anything looking to an objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will withhold any objection until he can be fully informed of the object of the resolution, I think he will not then object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the letter from the Secretary of War be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 22, 1906.

SIR: I respectfully request that the following resolution be introduced and passed by the House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War is authorized to employ the United States Army transport Sumner to convey, from New York to Santiago de Cuba and return, the members of the Santiago battlefield commission and the representatives of the President and of the State and War Departments, to enable them to attend the ceremonies to be held at the dedication of battle monuments at El Caney, Fort San Juan, San Juan Ridge, and San Juan de Mayaras Hill, in the immediate vicinity of Santiago de Cuba."

The project has received the sanction and cooperation of the War and State Departments, and the Government of Cuba has presented a number of cannon for use in the construction of the monuments. It has also granted a site for their erection, and will prepare suitable approaches.

The current act of appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government contains the following requirement:

"For marking the places where the American soldiers fell and were temporarily interred in Cuba and China, $9,500, said sum to be immediately available." (Act of March 3, 1905, 33 Stat. L., 1196.)

In a memorandum of instruction furnished by the Secretary of War to the Chief of Staff on May 12, 1905, a committee was appointed and charged with the duty of carrying out the provisions of the enactment above cited, with the proviso that "No mileage or traveling expenses or any other personal expenses incurred by the members of the committees will be charged to this appropriation or any other Government appropriation."

The members of this committee have paid their necessary traveling expenses themselves, and have discharged their duty in Cuba. The marking has been proceeded with so far as to permit the dedicatory exercises to be held on the 14th of February next.

A large amount of material procured out of the funds made available by the clause of the appropriation above cited has been procured by manufacture and can be conveyed to the places in which the monuments are to be erected on the transport Sumner, if assigned to this duty.

The Government of Cuba is disposed to make important this commemoration of the various battles in the neighborhood of Santiago. The resolution need not carry any appropriation. If it is passed, the expense can be met out of the general transportation appropriation for the War Department. The Sumner is now in New York Harbor. The trip would take from eleven to fourteen days. The additional cost, by reason of this trip, to the Government over and above that now involved in maintaining the transport in New York Harbor would be $500 a day for not exceeding fourteen days.

I inclose papers showing the action of the army societies of the Spanish war.

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. H. TAFT, Secretary of War.

Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the House that heretofore the transports have been used in many cases, in my judgment, without any clear authority of law. In this case I suppose the Secretary of War had a right to order it for this proposed trip to Cuba as much as he had a right to order one to Colon or to any point in the West Indies, when not for legitimate Army service. If this resolution is passed it makes no precedent for the future, but it does establish the fact that Congress has entire jurisdiction over the use of the transports for anything outside of their legitimate use as transports of the Army for military purposes. This is a great occasion between the Government of Cuba and the Government of the United States. On many occasions not as important as this the Government has ordered war ships to do this service at an immensely increased cost, and it seems to me, in view of all the facts surrounding these great dedicatory exercises in Cuba, in view of the fact of the close relation between the Government of the United States and the Government of Cuba, in view of the fact that our soldiers' graves are the ones to be honored on this occasion and the valor of American troops exalted, that the House and the Senate should by a unanimous vote, without an objecting voice, grant the transport Sumner for the uses asked for by the President and the Secretary of War on this occasion, and I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to know if the gentleman does not think that some limitation should be fixed upon the expense of this trip in this resolution?

Mr. HULL. I will say that the limitation is stated by the Secretary of War not to exceed $500 a day, and I will say further that all parties going on the transport pay for their subsistence. There is no expense to the Government for subsistence at all. Everyone traveling on the transport, except officers of the ship and enlisted men of the Army, is compelled to pay for the entire cost of his meals.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I doubt whether the gentleman——

Mr. HULL. And the entire length of time will not exceed fourteen days and may fall under that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I doubt whether the gentleman understood what I asked. I asked whether this resolution should not fix the limit. The Secretary of War says that, in his opinion, it will cost about $500 a day; but I suggest that that is no limitation upon the amount that can be expended.

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that if the resolution is considered now and any Member of this House believes that an amendment should be adopted providing that the total expense shall not exceed $7,000 I shall raise no objection to that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would suggest $10,000. I only want a reasonable limit fixed.

Mr. HULL. I would take the Secretary at his word, where he says it will not exceed $500 a day for fourteen days, and that is $7,000.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, it is only necessary, in my opinion, to say a word or so about the resolution asked to be passed by the Secretary of War. It should pass at once, and I trust there will be no objection to it. The letter of the Secretary of War gives the reasons why it should pass. It seems to me that it is a truly patriotic thing for this Government to participate in the ceremonies to be held to mark the graves of the American soldiers who fell in Cuba in the war between Spain and the United States, and to send this transport, now lying in New York Harbor at an expense to the Government, down to Santiago to participate in these commendable ceremonies. I believe this transport should be sent to Cuba for this purpose. The expense will be very small, simply the difference between keeping the fires of the transport up in New York Harbor and the additional coal that will be burned in having the transport go out on the ocean and down to Cuba. It will only require ten or fourteen days to make the trip, and the purpose is patriotic and praiseworthy. It is a small matter, too small for anybody to object to, and I hope there will be no opposition to the immediate adoption of the resolution.

I agree with all the Secretary of War has said in regard to this matter, and I hope this resolution will pass, and that this transport will be sent down there to participate in the proceedings inaugurated by Cuba and the United States relative to the marking of the graves of the brave and heroic soldiers who fell in the battle of Santiago. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I offer an amendment providing that the total additional expense shall not exceed $7,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that we give them a little leeway, because there might be something unforeseen, the steamer might be delayed.

Mr. HULL. Make it $10,000 additional expense.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the resolution: "Provided, That the total additional expense shall not exceed $10,000."

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to object to the proposed amendment, but I do not think this resolution should have this limitation put upon it, and I hope for one that it will be voted down. We can trust our distinguished Secretary of War in the matter. The steamer might be delayed in a storm or might be compelled by stress of weather to go to some other port. I am willing to take the assurance of the Secretary of War about the matter instead of adopting this suspicious amendment. I hate to be always fearful that some one is going to do something he should not do. I feel confident that not one cent more than is absolutely necessary will be expended. This is not to be a junketing trip, but a patriotic performance of a sacred duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word. I thoroughly disagree with my colleague. I believe when an appropriation is proper for any purpose Congress should fix some limitation upon the amount which the executive officer shall expend. The Secretary of War says it will not take more than fourteen days, and allowing $500 a day for fourteen days the expense would be $7,000. We increase the limit to $10,000, which gives a leeway of six days. No possible contingency, except a shipwreck, could delay this boat more than six days. If there should be a serious breakdown they could easily get permission to expend additional money. But I am opposed to unlimited appropriations for any purpose, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, that is all very fine as a general proposition, but I wish to ask the gentleman from New York if he can not take the assurance in this matter of the Secretary of War?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I believe we are under obligations to perform our duty in accordance with the law and not to accept anybody's word as to how much money we should appropriate. We should decide that for ourselves. I am ready to assume my responsibility and act in that way.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the joint resolution and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JAMES) there were—ayes 134, noes 32.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12320—the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

THE ISTHMIAN CANAL.

To continue the construction of the Isthmian Canal, to be expended under the direction of the President in accordance with an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, as follows:

For miscellaneous material purchases in the United States, $1,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "in the United States" and insert in lieu thereof "elsewhere than on the Isthmus of Panama," so that it will read:

"For miscellaneous material purchases elsewhere than on the Isthmus of Panama."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention of the committee to the fact that this appropriation is made available for expenditure only in the United States. The language, I believe, was used inadvertently, without realizing what its significance would be. Everybody recollects that some months ago the Secretary of War announced that he would purchase materials for the Panama Canal wherever they could be purchased cheapest. In submitting his estimates and requests for these appropriations it was contended that certain purchases should be made on the Isthmus and certain other purchases should not be made on the Isthmus. In order to distinguish the appropriations the language in the bill was used, but if it be continued in the bill in its present shape it will be impossible for the Secretary of War to take advantage of the cheapest markets for the purchase of these particular supplies. In order that there may be no restriction on his power, in order that he may go into the market where he can purchase cheapest, this change of language should be made and the money available should be expended in any place except on the Isthmus. This will give him that opportunity.

Mr. DE ARMOND rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to oppose the amendment, but to make some observations upon the general subject and to ask for some information. I recollect that last spring, or early last summer, there was a good deal in the newspapers about an official decision to purchase wherever articles could be bought the cheapest. For a week or two, or perhaps a little more—for a very short period of time, at all events—there was considerable comment upon the subject in the public press of the country, and then a deep and profound silence ensued. Now, I would like right well to know something about where we have been buying things, something about whether we have been buying them at the best prices or whether we have been buying them at prices unreasonably high. How much have we bought abroad? How much have we bought at home? Have American manufacturers met the competition of foreigners and supplied such things as we need as cheaply as the foreigners are willing to do? Have they failed to meet that competition? If so, have we then bought from foreigners at cheaper rates or from Americans at higher rates? I do not know how this is, and I suppose the public does not know how it is. I am one of those who believe that the United States in carrying forward a great work like this, necessarily a very costly work, ought to do what a sensible man would do in the conduct of his own business; that is, buy what he needs where he can buy it the cheapest and to the best advantage. I believe that American manufacturers can supply what is needed down there just as cheaply as foreigners, but I believe that they will not do it unless they are sure that unless they do foreigners will supply the articles and they will lose the market. We have been in the habit of encouraging American manufacturers and permitting them and enabling them and inviting them to charge the Americans more than they charge foreigners. Now, when we come to a great undertaking like this the Government can not afford it; it is immoral and wrong and wasteful of the people's money for the Government to invest in American supplies unless they are furnished as cheaply as supplies equally good and equally adapted to the work can be obtained abroad. Now, I would be very glad to hear from somebody who knows, if there is somebody here who does know—and I presume there is—where we really have been making our purchases; whether we have been making them at competitive prices or whether we have been making them at trust prices; whether we have been buying as cheaply as we could buy or have been buying from favored Americans at such prices as they chose to exact. Instead of being opposed to this amendment, if I get the meaning of it, I am in favor of it.

This paragraph might provide for limiting the purchases to the United States, and of course that would mean purchases in the United States at such prices as may prevail in the United States. In other words, purchases from American manufacturers at American manufacturers' home prices, without any reference to the foreign prices and without any regard for the effect upon the Public Treasury or the people's rights. If this amendment be adopted, there should be no interference with purchases here in the United States, except that those who make the purchases will not be under compulsion to make them without any regard to prices or quality or fitness of the things to be purchased. If this limitation be imposed, it will be a closing against the United States of the foreign markets for the purchase of these things and will be turning over the Treasury of the United States to American manufacturers at their own figures and without competition. To that I am opposed, and to that it seems to me everybody ought to be opposed. Now, I hope, both for my own information and for the information of the general public, that some one who possesses the information will tell us where we have been buying and how we have been buying, whether we have been buying in a competitive market or in the trust market at trust prices. It seems to me these inquiries are pertinent, and I trust they will be frankly answered.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, purchases under this head have been in nearly all instances made under the submission of proposals with full specifications, advertised throughout the United States, and, where it was believed material could be purchased cheaper, even in foreign countries. I should regret very much to see this additional legislation inserted in this paragraph. The separation between purchases in the United States and purchases at the Isthmus of Panama was made in the bill so as to control and limit them plainly. The Isthmian Canal Commission have established a purchasing bureau, presided over by a man of great experience and capability in this particular field. They have exhibited to us carefully drawn specimens of their method of submitting proposals with elaborate specifications, advised us that it cost them practically $100 to $150 for advertising expense in connection with each contract; that the proposals were published wherever they had any idea that they would meet with consideration, and I can not see what good object can be achieved by legislating in this way in this bill. The purchases will all be made in the United States, or rather the contracts will be made here, whether the goods are produced or manufactured in a foreign country or in the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This amendment does not prevent the expenditure of this money for purchases on the Isthmus.

Mr. LITTAUER. I realize that. The amendment concerns simply the first category in the bill, and is for material purchases in the United States. The purchase will be made here, whether the material comes from abroad or otherwise.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not necessarily. It appears in the hearings that certain foreign firms have representatives in the United States who, if they desired, might submit bids. Well, if they submitted bids and agreed to deliver from some place in Europe to the Isthmus, then, though the contract was made in the United States, it might be so construed that they were purchases abroad and——

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not so understand it. All purchases will be made either through representatives of foreign firms having their offices here or through the submission of bids under proposals. It is not designed to confine the purchases simply to products of the United States. It is designed to buy whatever is bought from the lowest bidder.

Mr. JAMES. If that is true, what objection have you to inserting the amendment and say they shall expend this million dollars wherever they can expend it the cheapest?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is exactly what they are doing now.

Mr. JAMES. Well, then, what objection have you to making it plain?

Mr. LITTAUER. It simply adds new legislation where it is not required.

Mr. JAMES. It is a very easy matter; it will not take much time to do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There never has been any legislation in this language—"for material purchases in the United States"—and this language unquestionably limits——

Mr. LITTAUER. This is the first time we have attempted to make detailed appropriations in connection with this work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And this language will limit purchases out of the million dollars to the United States.

Mr. LITTAUER. This will limit purchases in the United States, but the purchases can be made here in the United States of material coming from foreign countries.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was an instance, if the gentleman will permit me, where the Isthmian Canal Commission sent abroad and intended, if they could succeed in doing so, to get contracts for the purchase of certain steamers.

Mr. LITTAUER. Provided they could have obtained steamers better fitted for their work than could be procured here. They found, however, they could not so procure them, and hence bought them in this country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But if the money available for that purpose had been restricted by this provision, they could not have purchased those steamers on the other side.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, not at all.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me? The reason the separation is made in these cases is because there are two auditors. How far that will go I will not undertake to say; but there is an auditor on the Isthmus and an auditor here. The auditor on the Isthmus audits the purchases which are made on the Isthmus. The auditor in the United States audits all other purchases, and the purpose of putting some language in there is so that we credit on the books of the different auditors the amount that is proper, and out of those items the audits are made in the two different auditors' offices.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said I believe this language was used inadvertently. The next item provides for expenditure for purchases on the Isthmus. It was intended that this money should be expended elsewhere than on the Isthmus, and that is the language of the amendment I suggest. The language in the bill at present confines the purchase in the United States, because I say——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JAMES. I ask that the gentleman may have his time extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the remark of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] None is heard.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have no desire to consume any further time unless some one wishes to ask a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to state to the gentleman, in the case I have stated, if this language had been in the law controlling the expenditure of the money that was to be used for the purchase of these steamers it would have been impossible for a representative of the Commission to have gone to Liverpool and purchased steamers there under a law that provided that the purchase should be made in the United States.

Mr. LITTAUER. I trust that the gentleman recognizes that we do not want to have traveling purchasing agents going all over the world attempting to make purchases, but that purchases should be made under bids submitted here in Washington and controlled by the chief purchasing agent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, that is not the controlling reason for this language, and the result of it will be to prevent the expenditure of this money in any place except in the United States. I am in favor of giving the Secretary of War or the Isthmian Canal Commission a free hand to purchase in the market that is cheapest, be it in the United States or be it in some other country.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman, but I desire to call his attention to this, which I understand to be the fact: The Commission does purchase more or less from the island of Jamaica, which purchases are audited in the office of the auditor for the Isthmus, and will come out of the appropriation for the purchase of supplies on the Isthmus. Now, whether the language limits the purchase to articles that are on the Isthmus when they are purchased, in the one case, or articles that are in the United States when they are purchased, in the other case, I do not know. I think it ought to be done.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Were the steam shovels that were purchased for the Isthmus purchased in the open market of the world or in the limited market of the United States?

Mr. MANN. I understand they purchase all of these articles in the open market of the world.

Mr. JAMES. Did they do it in that instance?

Mr. MANN. Yes; they did it in that instance.

Mr. JAMES. In the open market of the world?

Mr. MANN. In the open market of the world. I may say to the gentleman that there is only one manufacturer in the world at present that manufactures the best type of steam shovel, namely, the one which manufactures the Bucyrus steam shovel, in Ohio.

Mr. JAMES. I am not talking about the best type. That might control the purchases of some man, but some other man might think that some other type was the best. The question is whether or not the plows or these other implements were purchased in the United States at the price at which they are sold usually to purchasers of them—whether you went to the open market of the world for bids.

Mr. MANN. Anybody was permitted to bid upon these articles.

Mr. JAMES. Who got the contract?

Mr. MANN. Of course an enterprising citizen of the United States got the contract, and I am sorry that it was not a Kentucky citizen, because in that State enterprise is always supreme.

Mr. JAMES. Was he one of the "trustized" citizens of the United States?

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman wants me to make definitions. I will leave that with the gentleman.

Mr. GRAFF. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. MANN. If I have any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] has the time.

Mr. GRAFF. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he knows whether or not the tariff schedules of the United States operate in the Isthmian Zone?

Mr. MANN. The tariff schedules do not operate in the Isthmian Zone. The tariff schedules in the Isthmian Zone are the tariff schedules of the Republic of Panama.

Mr. GRAFF. Then if the purchase was made in the United States of supplies in England, and they were shipped direct from England to the Zone, tariff would be collected by the Panama Government on those imports?

Mr. MANN. There is no tariff collected on articles sent there for the Isthmian Canal Commission——

Mr. GRAFF. Those are admitted free?

Mr. MANN (continuing). In the construction of the canal.

Mr. GRAFF. On articles admitted for general purposes outside of this enterprise there is imposed a duty by the Panama Government?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust this amendment will not prevail. I want to say, in answer to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] who asked the question as to how these purchases have been made, how it is proposed to continue purchases in the future, whether by advertising or whether by receiving private bids or private offers, every dollar that has been expended for material and supplies on the Isthmus up to this time, except $283,000, has been expended for materials and supplies after advertising in all of the principal cities in the United States.

I hold in my hand here a complete statement of all the contracts that have been made since the beginning of the work on the canal under the jurisdiction of the Canal Commission, and for the information of the committee I will read just a few items. Take the item of forage, $4,808.40, advertised twenty-eight days in the American Elevator and Grain Transactions, Chicago; Grain Dealers' Journal, Chicago; Hay and Grain Reporter, Chicago; Southwestern Grain Journal, Topeka; American Miller, Chicago; Operative Miller, Chicago; Northwestern Miller, Minneapolis; Roller Mill, Buffalo; Millers' Review, Philadelphia, and Dixie Miller, Nashville.

Now, I have another item here for the purchase of an air compressor, at a cost of $5,900.04, advertised twenty-eight days and the contract let to the lowest bidder. Advertised in the Iron Age, New York; Engineering News, New York; Engineering Record, New York; Metal Worker, New York; Metal Industry, New York; Scientific American, New York; Commercial Bulletin, Boston; Progressive American, Philadelphia; Engineers' Review, Cleveland; Pacific Hardware Journal, San Francisco, and twenty other trade journals.

The advertisements are very short, but they are uniform. Then I have here the specifications furnished to all proposed bidders for these various items. Bearing in mind that every dollar except $283,000 has been expended in this way and expended under contracts made in different parts of the United States for material, equipment, and supplies, gentlemen will readily see that the purchases have been made in the open and in the open market of the United States. There is no opportunity whatever for combinations or controlling the prices, and in every instance except in the case of the $283,000 the contracts were made to the lowest responsible bidder, and that $283,000 was expended upon order of the chairman of the Commission for absolute necessaries which they had to have immediately.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he does not think the language in the bill leaves it in doubt as to whether the Government can buy supplies and materials and equipment for the canal in France or Germany or anywhere else except either in the United States or on the Isthmus?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not think it leaves any doubt at all, Mr. Chairman. I do not think on the particular items mentioned in this paragraph that the Commission could go abroad for the purpose of buying these materials. If material is shipped to the Isthmus from France or England or Germany or any other country, the Commission could buy it; but they would buy it under the paragraph following the one to which the gentleman from New York has offered his amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will indulge me a moment further, I do not think this matter is as important from the standpoint of the actual purchase of the material elsewhere as it is from the standpoint of giving the Government the whip hand, in order to keep it from being combined against and imposed upon by our own people. I believe that the American manufacturers can manufacture all these things, or nearly all of them, cheaper than anybody else, and can sell them cheaper, if they will; but it is of the highest importance that there shall be no doubt about the fact that the Government can, if it will, purchase elsewhere, in order that the knowledge of the fact may make these people state a reasonable price to the Government. But if the gentleman is of the opinion that there is no doubt about the proposition, why of course the Government will still have this whip hand left.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask for a few minutes more, to reply to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. When, I say, Mr. Chairman, that the prices paid for the material thus far purchased and the prices that will be paid for materials, machinery, and equipment hereafter purchased, will be purchased in the general competitive market, and when the Commission affords the manufacturers all over the United States engaged in the manufacture of that particular article an opportunity to make an open bid for the furnishing of the material, machinery, or equipment, I can not see how it is possible for the Government to suffer the least or for any combination to secure a higher price for that particular purchase. Now, I will answer the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Will the gentleman inform the House how many bidders there were for any of these contracts, and who they were?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know. This paper shows the order, the date, the name of the firm to whom the contract was let, the character of the material, the amount of the cost, the period of advertising, whether the contract was let to the lowest bidder, and the names of the newspapers advertised in. It does not give the number of the bidders, but it does state in every instance that I have observed here in going through this that the contract was let to the lowest bidder, with the exception of $283,000 for supplies and material that the Commission had to have immediately and could not await the advertising.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Then I understand the gentleman has no information as to how many different bidders offered themselves for any one contract?

Mr. TAWNEY. The testimony before the committee was that there were a great many different bidders and that the bids varied very materially.

Mr. GILLESPIE. American manufacturers have two prices, a home price and a foreign price. For instance, on steel rails there is quite a difference between the price of steel rails for this country and steel rails for Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want just a moment more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLESPIE. For instance, steel rails sell in Canada for $22 and in Mexico for the same price, and they are $28 here. Now, using that as a basis, can the gentleman inform me now——

Mr. TAWNEY. Right on that point I will say that of course the Commission is not purchasing a great many steel rails, but the price stated by the Commission to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations was $26.45 alongside the ship, and $28 is the price at the mill.

Mr. GILLESPIE. And $26 over there?

Mr. TAWNEY. Twenty-eight dollars at the mill and $26.45 for these steel rails at the ship.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Now, is it not a fact that they sell these same steel rails and deliver them in Canada and Mexico for $22?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know anything about what they sell for in Canada or anywhere else. I am talking about the rails purchased by the Canal Commission, for which they paid $26.45 at the side of the ship, and the price to the American consumer at the mill is $28; so they are getting them down there for less than they could get them if they were using them here.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Are they getting them for less than these same manufacturers will sell the very same rails to purchasers in Canada or Mexico and deliver them there?

Mr. TAWNEY. That I do not know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman believe that these different materials can be purchased in the United States?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do, and I think they ought to be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then will the gentleman inform the committee why, if that is his opinion, he did not restrict the expenditures to be made in the appropriation of $1,565,786, in lines 17, 18, and 19, to purchases exclusively in the United States?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because of the difference in the character of the material to be purchased. Here we were dealing with miscellaneous material purchases in the United States, $1,000,000. Now, what the gentleman refers to is for new equipment purchases, $1,565,786.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the new equipment purchases are steam shovels, locomotives, and dredges, which are particularly well manufactured in the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. The number of manufacturers of that equipment in this country are comparatively small, and therefore the number of competitors should be much greater under this provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated that there was only one manufactory in the world that made first-class steam shovels and that is a concern in Ohio.

Mr. TAWNEY. That may be true.

Mr. LITTAUER. If the gentleman will permit me, that item, $1,565,786, is an item to provide the money to pay for contracts already entered into, already partially delivered, and this will complete them. They can determine the amount of those contracts up to $6.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, there was nothing in the hearings to the effect that this particular appropriation was required to complete contracts.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is nevertheless the fact, and the details given here—flat cars, locomotives, and other things in the same line—are a repetition of the details given us at the time the $16,500,000 deficiency appropriation was asked for, and this is for the proportion not provided for in that provision. The contract for the delivery of these various items have all been entered into, and this is simply the balance to be delivered and paid for under the contract.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say that that is not my understanding of the item.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota please state whether any person, company, or corporation outside of the United States made any bid, and if any of these bids are accepted?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am unable to answer the gentleman's question. My impression is, however, that there were no bids made by firms outside of the United States, and, therefore, there were none accepted. I would state to the gentleman, however, that there are representatives of foreign manufacturers in this country, all of whom have an opportunity to bid on these contracts. The bids are not limited to the products of the United States, nor to people who are engaged in the manufacture of these products in the United States. The bids are open bids, made in this country, and if a foreign representative of some foreign manufacturer wanted to put in a bid he could do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, my object in rising is not so much to say anything myself as to endeavor to get further information from those who may possess it, and I would be glad to ask the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, about these railroad iron bids. I did not quite understand him. If I understood him correctly, he said that we had been paying $26.45 a ton for railroad iron for use on the Isthmus.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is correct; that was the testimony before the committee.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Is it not a fact that the same manufacturers are selling the same sort of rails in foreign countries for from $20 to $22 a ton?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not say it is a fact, for I do not know.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Were there any foreign bidders for any of these contracts?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know; but, as I said, the representatives of foreign manufacturers of steel rails in this country had an opportunity to bid here.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I mean contracts generally.

Mr. TAWNEY. My impression is there were no foreign bids made or accepted. I do not know as to the fact, but that is only an impression gathered from the testimony before the committee. The direct question was not asked nor answered or testified to.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he knows how it happened that there were no foreign bidders, if there were none?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know, and I will not say positively that there were none.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Does the gentleman know whether the prices paid are the prices which American manufacturers usually get for similar articles abroad, or, approximately, prices which they get for the same articles at home?

Mr. TAWNEY. I only know this: That the prices at which this material and equipment and supplies are purchased is the lowest competitive price that could be obtained by the Commission after advertising for four weeks in particular localities where the material and supplies are manufactured and produced.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Can the gentleman answer this question——

Mr. TAWNEY. One moment. My colleague from New York on the committee calls my attention to this testimony of Mr. Shonts:

> Mr. LITTAUER. Now, I notice that a large item—about one-third of the amount it would be—is for steel rails. That you explain in connection with the second track and the spur tracks?
> Secretary TAFT. Yes.
> Mr. TAWNEY. What do you pay for steel rails?
> Mr. SHONTS. From $21.45 to $26.45. The railroads in this country charge $28.
> Mr. TAWNEY. What is the weight at the mills?
> Mr. ROSS. The weight is 70 pounds to the yard. They give us this price at Baltimore——
> Mr. SHONTS. Whereas $28 is the domestic price at the mills.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will ask the gentleman a further question—whether it appears to him from his investigation of this matter that the Americans in these contracts got them because they were able to do the work or furnish the articles cheaper than anybody else could do. Is that the understanding of the gentleman?

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not quite catch the question of the gentleman.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Is it the gentleman's understanding from his investigation that the Americans obtained all these contracts for the sale of the articles because they could and did supply them cheaper than anybody else offered to do?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not answer the gentleman's question, because I do not know whether there were foreign bids or not; but I do know that the prices for furnishing the material for the Commission—that the purchases were made at the lowest competitive price that could be obtained after advertising in the several localities throughout the country where these articles are produced.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will ask this question: Does it appear, then, that these American manufacturers supplied articles to this Commission at the world's competitive prices, or approximating those, and were able to do so, or at the prices that they are supplying similar articles here?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is so much confusion in the House that I was unable to hear the gentleman's question. I endeavored to catch it, but I failed.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will ask the gentleman another question: Does the gentleman know any reason why the American manufacturer can not supply people in this country with similar articles as cheaply as he can supply them to the Government in Panama?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not, and I do not know that they are not doing so.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Well, the gentleman does not know, then, really, except in the matter of steel rails, whether the Government purchases these articles cheaper than the general American consumer purchases them from the American manufacturer?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know whether the Government is purchasing these items for less than the American consumer at home is doing, except in the item of steel rails, as I answered the gentleman a moment ago.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Let me ask one other question. Does not the gentleman believe that the tendency would be to get lower and better prices and greater and more valuable competition by advertising abroad as well as at home?

Mr. TAWNEY. What advantage is to be gained in advertising abroad, and thus add to the additional expense of advertising over there? If we made purchases abroad we would have to have foreign inspectors. The representatives of foreign manufacturers in this country are looking out for business all the time, and have access to the same newspapers in which these advertisements are made that the manufacturer here has.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Then I understand the gentleman to say that there would be no advantage, in his judgment, in advertising abroad?

Mr. TAWNEY. None whatever that I can see. The foreign manufacturer has the opportunity, just the same as the American manufacturer, to submit his bid for the various contracts that the Commission offers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. Is the gentleman prepared to state that the foreign representatives of European concerns are authorized generally to make bids for large amounts of supplies on the canal, or whether these representatives would not be obliged to lose one week by corresponding with the home concern and another week by return of the mail before they would start on an even basis with the bidders here at home—with the domestic concerns?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, whether there is any necessity for the delay incident to correspondence by mail I do not know, but if the contract is of sufficient size to justify them in undertaking to secure it, then they have the same access to the cables that is open to anybody else, and undoubtedly if they could secure the contract at a profit they would be glad to avail themselves of that cable.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, the gentleman acknowledges that only twenty-eight days' notice is given in the advertisements for bids, and I understand he admits further that no foreigners have secured any contracts for supplies on the isthmian canal. Will the gentleman undertake to account for the reason, namely, why all of the supplies are furnished by United States concerns?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not give the gentleman any reason why other than that foreign representatives of European concerns fail to make as low bids as the American manufacturers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Is there any tariff on supplies that come into the isthmian canal that gives American manufacturers a preference over European manufacturers?

Mr. TAWNEY. I suppose the gentleman is fully aware of the fact that there is no tariff. Our American tariff does not apply to the isthmian Canal Zone, but the goods under all contracts, by whomsoever they are taken, are required, under the specifications, to be delivered for payment at the Isthmus, and whether they come in from a foreign country or whether they are shipped from the United States they are paid upon the basis of delivery on the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. PALMER. Pay no duty.

Mr. TAWNEY. Pay no duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 53, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk, and ask to have the Clerk read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following: "Said purchases shall not be confined to the United States, but the things purchased shall be bought upon the best terms that the world's markets afford."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order; that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to be heard upon that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would ask the gentleman from Minnesota to again state the ground of his point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. That it is new legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This whole item is new legislation.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion which preceded upon the amendment just voted down it was claimed that the amendment was unnecessary and is unnecessary because the phraseology under consideration has reference to the locus of the contract—the fact of the purchase being made in the United States—and that by this language it is not meant to exclude purchases of articles brought from elsewhere than the United States. The Chairman will recollect distinctly that that is the ground upon which this amendment was opposed; that it did not exclude purchases of articles outside of the United States, but that it had reference to the auditing of accounts in the United States by the purchasing agent in the United States, who, in the United States, would give orders for the articles no matter where they came from.

Now, I do not believe that fairly, or at least necessarily, the language will bear that construction beyond a possibility of doubt or misunderstanding. If the language means that the articles may come from anywhere; that anybody, whether a citizen of the United States or an alien, may supply them; that they may be brought from any place in the United States or from any place out of the United States, then I think the amendment which I suggested merely will make plainer and clearer that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if there is now any existing law upon this proposition?

Mr. TAWNEY. The general provisions of the act creating the Commission authorizing the purchase of the canal and the construction of the canal is the only law which we have on the subject. Of course, if this is not a change of existing law, then, of course, the Commission can buy anything anywhere, and what object has the gentleman from Missouri in offering the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The object of the gentleman does not concern the Chair.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not think there is any specific law applicable to the place as to where the purchases made by the Canal Commission shall be made, but there is a general law beyond which the Commission heretofore claimed they were not authorized to go in the making of their purchases.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri changes existing law, the Chair will rule the amendment to be in order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am unable to cite the Chair to the law covering the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the point is overruled.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make some remarks on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri desires to be heard on his amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The purpose of the amendment is to make this provision of the law show just precisely and beyond the possibility of misunderstanding or misconstruction what gentlemen claim it already means without the amendment. Now, if the provision as it stands in this bill does not limit the purchasing agent in the United States making contracts in the United States to the American market, then there can be no objection, it seems to me, to this provision offered by this amendment. If, however, the provision as it stands does, or by misconstruction, if you please, might, limit the purchasing agent to articles of American production—in other words, to the American market—then there is the very greatest and very best of reasons why the amendment ought to be adopted. Now, if you really wish to confine the purchases to the American market, then vote down the amendment and interpret the construction of this provision contrary to what you now claim it means. If, on the other hand, you desire to enable the purchasing agent of the Government to purchase the articles at the world's price upon the best terms that can be obtained, no matter who supplies them or where they come from, then it seems to me that this amendment ought to be adopted to remove whatever of uncertainty or danger there might be from misconstruction of the provision as it stands. That is all I care to say about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 58, noes 74.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I believe I would like to have tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 93.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous material purchases on the Isthmus and miscellaneous expenditures, consisting of hotel and hospital and other supplies, transportation of labor from West Indies, $400,000.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in lines 5 and 6 the words "from West Indies," so that the appropriation for the transportation of labor shall apply generally to the United States or any other place. This is only just and fair, it seems to me, to the workingman in our own country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 5 and 6 strike out the words "from West Indies."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I will occupy the attention of the committee only a moment. I desire to say a word or two in support of this amendment. It seems to me this provision carrying $400,000 for transportation of labor should apply to the workingman of the United States as well as to the laboring man of the West Indies. I do not think there ought to be any limitation or distinction in this matter. In fact, if there is going to be any discrimination it should be in favor of our own people.

I want to give the working people of the United States a chance to do some of the work on the canal, as well as the laborers of the West Indies, and treat Americans, if anything, a little better than aliens. I wish to protect our own people as well as foreigners, so far as this provision goes, to pay the transportation of workingmen to and from the Canal Zone. My amendment will do this, and in my opinion it is just and fair. It is impossible for me to conceive why a distinction in the matter is made against our own working people in favor of laboring people from the West Indies. If we are going to pay the transportation of the West Indian laborers to and from the canal, then I submit we should pay the expenses of our own working people to and from the Isthmus. The provision in the bill discriminates against the hard-working and industrious people of our own country, and I am opposed to that in any way, just as I am opposed to the other provision in this bill to make the eight-hour law inapplicable to the Canal Zone. I am in favor of the eight-hour law here and everywhere. Industrial labor has struggled for years to place it on the statute books, and I shall always oppose its modification or repeal at the dictation of selfish contractors who want to work their men nine or ten hours a day, even if the work to be done is on the isthmian canal. I am surprised that the Republicans of this House favor this modification of the eight-hour law, and when that provision is reached I trust it will be stricken out of this bill on a point of order. I stand for the rights of the American workingman; and, in Congress or out of Congress, I shall always do all in my power to advance his interests and aid him in every way I can to ameliorate his condition. These provisions I refer to discriminate against our own workingmen and strike a blow at the dignity of the American toiler. I am absolutely against such legislation. I trust, therefore, that my amendment will be adopted, and the other provision in this bill, repealing the eight-hour law in so far as it is applicable to work in the Canal Zone, will be stricken out of the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER) there were—ayes 51, noes 55.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. LITTAUER and Mr. SULZER as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 77.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I now move to amend the bill as follows: In line 6, after the words "West Indies," insert "or colored labor from the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, after the words "West Indies," insert the words "or colored labor from the United States."

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in behalf of the colored workingmen who are going to the Canal Zone from the United States. If we are going to pay the transportation of the West Indian negro, then why in the name of fairness and common sense should we not pay the expenses of the negro of the United States who leaves our own country to go to dig the Panama Canal? The gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber pretend to be the friends of the negro in America. I have often doubted your sincerity in the matter, but now I shall put it to the test and find out by your votes on this amendment if you think less of our own negro workingman than you do of a negro laborer from the West Indies—if you are willing to pay the latter's expenses to and from the Canal Zone and refuse to pay the transportation expenses of the American negro to and from the Isthmus. The vote on this amendment will tell the story more eloquently than words, and I am ready for the vote, and I shall hereafter point to the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER) the Chair announced that there were—ayes 26, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert a new paragraph, as follows:
"All new purchases shall be made at the lowest price and upon the best terms that the markets of the world afford."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DE ARMOND) there were—ayes 54, noes 63.

Tellers were demanded and ordered.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. LITTAUER and Mr. DE ARMOND as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries, incidental expenses, rents, cable and telegraph service in the United States, covering Washington office, including Commissioners, offices of assistant purchasing agents at New Orleans, New York, and Tacoma, $75,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In this five-minute debate I will not undertake to discuss the question under consideration; but my morning mail brings me a very interesting and instructive letter touching on the question under consideration—one from William S. Bucknell, an employee in Panama, whose veracity and standing are vouched for by my friend, the Hon. A. K. Bailey, a pioneer journalist, editor of the Decorah Republican, Decorah, Iowa, a gentleman of the highest standing, a close student of national affairs for half a century, whose ability, judgment, and integrity are recognized all over our State and by all who know him.

In view of all the criticisms and misinformation that have been printed, I deem it proper and in justice to the administration of affairs there that this unbiased, reliable, and valuable information be printed in order that the truth be known.

The value of this information, coming as it does, I am sure will be appreciated, and it clearly establishes the fact that the sanitary conditions on the Isthmus have been much improved, and that every possible effort has been put forth in an effective and intelligent manner to provide for the comfort, convenience, and health of the people there.

I ask leave to print these papers in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The papers are as follows:

[The Decorah Republican, A. K. Bailey & Son, proprietors.

DECORAH, IOWA, January 20, 1906.

Hon. G. N. HAUGEN.

DEAR SIR: I take the liberty to send you herewith a letter that will appear in the Republican of January 25. The writer is a citizen of Decorah, a man of integrity and intelligence; by occupation an architect, and a good one. He went to Panama nominally to be a "foreman of carpenters," but when he got there and they found his caliber he was put into office work as a draftsman and has been engaged at that work for over a year.

It seems to me his testimony contradicts positively that of Mr. Poultney Bigelow. Mr. Bucknell has no cause that I can see for misreporting the situation of affairs as he has seen them. His theme is the largeness of deeds done in the year. That of Bigelow's is the reverse. The latter should have no motive to misrepresent, but the constant desire to make as much of a "good story" of what he writes is a constant incentive to exaggeration in a correspondent, and especially so to one who has a reputation to maintain. Because of this difference I contend that Mr. Bucknell, though an humble citizen, having no reputation to sustain as a correspondent, is the most reliable witness of the two.

Yours, truly,

A. K. BAILEY.

ANCON, CANAL ZONE, ISTHMUS OF PANAMA,
January 10, 1906.

EDITORS REPUBLICAN: During the first of the month I took a trip on the cars across the Isthmus and back, and noticed in particular the improvements along the line—such a contrast between now and a year ago. Most everything is changed. At the towns and stations nearly all of the old buildings have been repaired, cleaned, and painted, and a number of new houses have been erected. Fly screens are being put on all houses, old and new. On some the entire verandas are screened. Brass and bronze screens are the only kinds used. Iron rusts out in a short time; therefore is not used at all. Along the railroad the brush and weeds have been cut and all present a more civilized appearance.

Perhaps it would be of interest to know a little of what is being done in the way of buildings and how employees are provided for. Nearly all buildings are frame structures, and all are furnished with shower baths, lavatories, and water-closets. At the present time there are three large buildings being erected at Ancon, Tivoli Hotel being the largest. It is to be three stories. It will have 150 bedrooms in the second and third stories. The first story will have several bedrooms, but most of the space will be taken up with dining halls, etc. Verandas for the three stories will extend around the entire building. The distance around the building, measuring at the outside edge of veranda, is 1,500 feet (over a quarter of a mile). The nurses' home and the bachelor officers' quarters are both alike and three stories high, with three-story verandas on all sides. Each will have rooms for 100 beds.

Plans are made for a $75,000 residence for the use of the governor of the Canal Zone. The walls will be of concrete blocks, and the interior finish of rooms will be hard wood. A large administration building, sanitary department building, and police court building are to be built at Ancon as soon as possible. Besides the foregoing, a large number of portable frame houses have been placed at Ancon for the use of married men. All of the best buildings are to have tile roofs. The cheaper kind have corrugated galvanized-iron roofs.

At Culebra a large office building is being erected for the engineering and architectural departments. Before many weeks these departments will be removed from Panama and located there. Empire, Culebra, and Gorgona are not far apart, and most of the married men's residences are being placed at these points.

At Corozal are married men's quarters and a Zone hotel. This hotel is typical of several that have been erected between Panama and Colon. Owing to the size it has lost favor, and smaller houses are taking the lead. It is three stories high, with three-story verandas on all sides. The first story is taken up with dining halls, office, and kitchen. The second and third stories are divided and have eighty bedrooms.

The material department is at Cristobal (the United States portion of Colon) and has quarters similar to the foregoing. A great many married men's residences have been built at this place and La Boca and other places along the canal.

A number of large hospitals were built at Colon and Ancon by the French, and others have been added by the Isthmian Canal Commission. These are the main centers, and most all sick are taken to one or the other of these places. There are a few emergency hospitals along the line that are made use of temporarily. Those who have been to these places when sick claim that they were well cared for.

Every station of any size is provided with a jail. Numerous other buildings have been erected, such as insane asylums, quarantine stations, cement-block plants, lumber sheds, barns, planing mills, etc.

According to contract the Commission are to furnish free quarters for all employees, and in case any of the employees are not allotted quarters they are allowed in lieu thereof a commutation equal to 15 per cent of their monthly salary, provided they apply for quarters and the Commission have none to give. If the Commission has quarters and the applicant refuses to take them, he is then barred from receiving commutation.

Married men who have their families here are provided with a private residence containing from three to eight rooms, the size of the house being according to the salary and the number to the family. Men without families are allotted rooms in the Zone hotels. The allowance to each is 1 square foot of floor space for each $1 of his month's salary. Those who receive less than $100 per month are allotted quarters several together in the same large room and sleep on cots. Those receiving $100 to $125 per month are allotted quarters, two to each room. Every person receiving $150 or more per month is given a room to himself. Rooms are furnished with oak furniture, and include bureau, washstand, table, two chairs, iron bedstead, bed springs, mattress, pillow, and lamp. The occupant furnishes his own sheets, blankets, and pillowcases. Married men receive furniture according to the size of the family, and are also furnished with a cooking range.

The Zone hotels are run by the Commission. It is understood that those who room at one of these are to take meals in the dining hall, the price being 30 cents (gold) for each meal. No extra is charged for taking care of rooms.

When an employee accepts quarters in one of these hotels he is furnished with a meal book containing fifty meal tickets by the timekeeper, and is charged $15 for it on the books. This amount is taken out of the salary at the end of the month. The books can be had in no other way, as the timekeeper is not allowed to take cash. By this method no one pays for more meals than he eats. Should an employee wish to leave before all the tickets have been used he can return the unused tickets and get credit for them. Two dining halls are in each of these hotels, one for office men and the other for carpenters and tradesmen.

There are a number of "chronic kickers" at these places that find more or less fault with meals, which at times is amusing and at other times disgusting. This, of course, is the natural consequence where so many board together. For my part, I can say that the board, with very few exceptions, is good, and far better than any that can be had at any other place on the Isthmus, and is as near like that of the United States as circumstances will permit.

Yours respectfully, WM. S. BUCKNELL.

P. S.—Eggs to-day in Panama are only 7½ cents (gold) each.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is withdrawn.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 16: "Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be used in the payment of salaries to press agents or other sentiment-promoting officers or employees."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, when the bill making appropriation for this project was before the House at an earlier day of the session the fact was disclosed that the Panama Commission had in its employ what was known as a "press agent." That produced in the minds of a good many people the conclusion that there was a kind of a scandal going on in connection with the operation of the affairs of the Commission; in other words, they had a Mr. Bishop employed at a salary of $10,000 per annum for the sole and express purpose of arousing a sentiment in favor of the project.

Now, sir, it seems to me that he was entirely useless in connection with this matter, if that was his sole business, for we all know that the sentiment in favor of the digging of the Panama Canal reaches from the Lakes to the Gulf and from one ocean to the other. Therefore it is entirely unnecessary to have one engaged in that capacity in connection with the affairs of the Commission. Now, sir, while I feel that I can not, in my humble capacity, change the policy of that Commission, still we can call attention of the country to the existence of such an evil; and while I understand that temporarily the Commission has decided to dispense with the services of that officer, the employee known as a "press agent," still we do not know, after this appropriation is made, after this Congress has adjourned, but what such an official will be employed again. Therefore if we call the attention of the Commission to the fact that the Congress does not favor the employment of officers or employees of that superfluous character it might cause them to act differently in the future.

Sir, at any rate, as I said a moment ago, if we can not do anything else, we can call the attention of the people to the fact that the Commission has willfully and deliberately paid out the sum of $10,000 per annum to one Mr. Bishop for the sole purpose of manufacturing sentiment in favor of the canal, when no sentiment was necessary, action alone being needed. Then, sir, they can do as they wish about the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MACON. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries, incidental expenses, rents, cable and telegraph service in the United States, covering Washington office, including Commissioners, offices of assistant purchasing agents at New Orleans, New York, and Tacoma, $75,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 16, add: "Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be paid to any Commissioner as compensation in addition to his salary as Commissioner."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the substance of this amendment was practically agreed upon by the committee. The intention of the committee was to prevent the payment of compensation to men under the guise of paying them for different services.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Under your amendment, will it be possible to pay the president of the Commission, Mr. Shonts, any more than $7,500?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will; if the President says that the Commissioner who shall be chairman of the Commission shall receive $30,000 a year, then that is his compensation as Commissioner. If he says that the Commissioner who shall act as governor of the Canal Zone shall receive $17,500, he receives that salary. This merely prevents the President saying that a man shall receive $7,500 a year as Commissioner and $22,500 as chairman. The salary for services ought to be fixed in a gross sum and paid them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For new equipment purchases, $1,565,786; in all, $5,340,786, which shall continue available until expended: Provided, That all expenditures from the appropriation herein made for the isthmian canal shall be paid from, or reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of, the proceeds of the sale of bonds authorized in section 8 of the said act approved June 28, 1902.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, by striking out all beginning with the word "provided," on page 15, line 21, down to and including the word "two" on line 2, page 16.

Line 21, page 15, beginning with the word "provided," strike out the remainder of the page and lines 1 and 2 on page 16.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to discuss that, but I do not want to pass it without renewing the objection formerly made, when the matter was up under the emergency bill, of this policy of bonding posterity, running in debt, issuing bonds to pay for these things when we have the money in the Treasury or in bank.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us have a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting a new paragraph, as follows:
"All purchases shall, so far as may be practicable, be made at the lowest prices and upon the best terms that can be obtained."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, Mr. Chairman, a single word on the amendment. That amendment, I think, is as carefully and conservatively phrased as anyone can desire who wishes to give those who purchase for the Government any option or any opportunity to buy nowhere except in the United States at any prices except those which the trust may fix. It provides that the purchases shall be made at the lowest price and upon the best terms obtainable, so far as may be practicable, leaving out of consideration instances of emergency, where it might be supposed that purchases ought to be made at a higher price or on poorer terms.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. What advantage does the gentleman from Missouri claim would result from this, or in what respect does this amendment of his differ from the practice that has obtained in the matter of making these purchases since the beginning of this work?

Mr. DE ARMOND. In answer to that, I will say that I shall be very much surprised if it is not contended later on that this peculiar language is intended to limit the purchasing agent to articles produced in the United States. I wish the Government to have the opportunity to buy where those who purchase conclude that they can do best, leaving it, so far as emergency purchases are concerned, to the option and judgment of the purchasing agent. If he thinks it is not practicable to buy at the lowest price that can be obtained or upon the best terms, owing to some exigency or contingency, or from some reason satisfactory to him, if this amendment be incorporated, there will be no coercion upon him; but the general admonition is: "Buy where you can buy best; make the money of the United States go as far as possible; expend as little as may be necessary to procure what you must have." That is the object and purpose of the amendment, and it seems to me a good object and a good purpose, which I think may not be accomplished by the provisions as they now stand.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the deficiencies carried in this section are to provide for deficiencies during the months of April, May, and June next. They amount to $5,000,000. Now, the Commission has already expended, or has had appropriations to expend, $21,000,000. They have followed out the course in making their purchases of having full advertisement and award to the lowest bidder. Why now make this comment on the procedure as it has properly proceeded?

Mr. DE ARMOND. If the gentleman will permit me to reply, this is not a comment upon anything that has been done. The incorporation of this amendment will not negative, does not criticise, will not interfere with any contract now subsisting, or any purchases that have heretofore been made. It is an admonition as to the future, from the time when this legislation shall become operative, as a general rule; in other words, when it is practicable, to buy for the best price and upon the best terms. Now, if there be objection to that, such objection can well be urged against this amendment. If there be no objection to that I do not know what objection can be urged against this amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER rose and was recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] says, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] will make no sort of change in the provision of the law as you have it before you now, and will result only in giving the Commission authority to pursue the practice which they have hitherto been pursuing and which they desire to pursue, then why not accept the amendment and let it go on the bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. Simply because I do not think it is good policy to attempt to prescribe by legislation the details for the running of any great business enterprise. If they do not conduct their business in a business-like manner, they can be removed at any time; but to attempt by legislation to confine them to certain rules and limitations which pertain merely to practical business common sense is not necessary, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the contention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] is that the language of this bill is a limitation and a restriction, and that the language which he offers as an amendment would remove all that, so that there would not be any limitation or restriction in the bill upon the discretion of the Commission to buy wheresoever they chose. So that when the gentleman says he does not believe in putting limitations or restrictions upon a bill of this character he argues over on the other side of the line and against the provision which he himself has offered. The very object of the amendment is to remove either the real or fancied restriction and limitation as to details in the provision of the bill itself.

Mr. TAWNEY. The statement that I made was not a limitation upon the expenditure of this appropriation, but I said it was impracticable to attempt by legislation to limit the carrying out of the details of a great enterprise like this.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I understood. Now, it is alleged, and it seems to me with considerable plausibility, if not with actual truth, that the provisions of the bill do enter into details and limit the Commission to certain things. Now, whether the provisions of the bill do that or not, there certainly is room from this language for somebody so to construe it if anybody chooses.

Now, the gentleman tells the House that he is in favor of the Commission buying material and equipment wherever they can get them the cheapest. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] also tells us that. Then it is alleged that the language of the bill is doubtful, and still gentlemen will not consent to remove the doubt by saying in plain language that the Commission shall have the power which they say it has, that they shall pursue a practice which they say it has pursued, and that the discretion in purchasing shall not be limited, contending that hitherto it has not been limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel that I am capable of fully understanding the position taken by the gentlemen on the other side in connection with this isthmian canal project. They insist, as I understand it, that the eight-hour law shall apply to employment, even of foreigners, upon the work upon the isthmian canal. They insist that we must employ them for only a limited length of time, like American workmen, and they insist at the same time that we shall buy the things that are necessary to use in the construction of the canal in the markets of the world, of contractors who employ their laborers ten and twelve hours a day.

I am unable to understand why it is any more desirable to employ foreign workmen under contractors ten and twelve hours a day, and thus take the labor from the American workmen, than it would be to employ foreigners upon the Isthmus to do the work that Americans can not do for ten or twelve hours a day.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The question is whether the gentleman from Iowa opposes the policy of buying at the least price and upon the best terms that can be obtained?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman's question. Things that can be produced for use upon the Isthmus by American labor I am in favor of producing by American labor, and paying the American wage scale, and consequently I do not want to buy these things in Europe or elsewhere outside of the United States; but work that is to be done on the Isthmus and can not be done by Americans—that is, not displacing American workmen—I am in favor of doing at the cheapest price. I see no discrimination against labor in employing European labor or any other labor on the Isthmus in work that can not be done by the Americans at the best prices, and, at the same time, buying the goods that Americans can produce in the United States at fair prices here. [Applause.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether he is opposed to putting a prohibition upon the officers who deal for the Government as to buying where they can buy the best and cheapest?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not in favor of buying goods abroad that can be produced by American labor simply because they can be more cheaply produced by some other labor. I am in favor of buying these goods—the product of American labor—for use upon the Isthmus; but gentlemen come here and say they are in favor of buying things that we can produce from foreigners—the product of foreign labor—and when it comes to doing the work that we can not do by American labor, limiting it to eight hours, and putting all possible restrictions on it. I can not understand how they can reconcile these two positions.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman is confounding two propositions. We are on one now. The proposition we are on now is a simple, plain proposition, if this bill means what it is said it means—to buy upon the best terms the officers could get—it would be their duty to do it. If it doesn't mean that, the gentlemen have not been very ingenuous in what they claim about it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is the gentleman from Missouri in favor of the employment of other than American labor on the Isthmus at more than eight hours a day?

Mr. DE ARMOND. When we come to that, I will take care of that. I have my own views upon that subject, but do not want to get away from this. As far as the gentleman from Iowa is concerned, I will meet him on that. The point we are on now is whether or not we should, in legislating on this subject where hundreds of millions, and the Lord only knows how many hundreds of millions, will be expended, say whether we are going to buy things at cost prices in America or at prices for which Americans are willing to sell similar articles abroad, or, in other words, whether we shall buy them in the world's market at the world's market prices.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has declined to answer——

Mr. DE ARMOND. No; I have not declined to answer.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. For the present—for the present—whether he is in favor of employing other than Americans on the Isthmus at more than eight hours a day; but he asserts that he is in favor as against American producers of buying goods for the Isthmus that could be produced in America of foreign producers who do employ labor more than eight hours a day.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to enlighten the gentleman I will answer, and I answer only for myself. I am not opposed to employing alien labor in the lower grades of work upon the construction of this canal upon terms of longer days than the eight-hour day. The reason I am not opposed to it is because, realizing that the American public will be compelled to pay untold numbers of millions of dollars for this great work, I am in favor by every reasonable, honest, and honorable method of lessening that expenditure as far as it may be done. I hope that is an answer to the question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I then congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] upon his personal consistency, but can not so congratulate those gentlemen who insist that the work that can be done in America shall be done by laborers toiling ten or twelve hours a day in foreign lands, but the work that can not be done in America and by Americans shall be done under the eight-hour law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] has left the consideration of the section just read and has proceeded to the consideration of the merits of the section to follow. Since he has done that, I shall imitate him. I am not in favor of suspending the laws of the United States in connection with governmental contracts or the hours of labor under that law. I do not believe that Congress ought to do it, and I am not at all fooled with the general argument that I am interfering "with freedom of contract." I understand human nature well enough to know that whenever you say to a lot of men, "You can work eight hours or you can work longer," or the Government says, "You can work eight hours if you want to or you can work longer if you want to; it is a matter of freedom of contract with you, between you and me"—I know that that is all high-sounding, empty fulmination. As a matter of human nature, I understand that that proportion of those laborers who would not want to work any more than eight hours, and who would dare say so, would soon find some occasion or opportunity to be dismissed—discharged from their work altogether. Common sense teaches that. I know it to be true. Here you have somebody working, let us say, in a governmental institution which keeps open on Sunday, but where it is left to the discretion of the employees to take Sunday labor or not as they please. Those who come in and take Sunday labor stay where they are, ensconced in position. Those who decline to agree that they will perform Sunday labor soon find that their services are not "absolutely needed" in the bureau or in the Department, and so it will be upon the Isthmus. The gentleman is, moreover, mistaken in concluding that there will not be any American labor upon the Isthmus. There will be American labor there, and there will be a great deal of it there before this is through with.

Mr. SULZER. Isn't there lots of it there now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course there is, and I say there will be a great deal more of it there before this is through with.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I never said there would be no American labor there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, the gentleman referred to the labor there as "alien labor."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I referred to alien labor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, this contract law—this law which says that the Government in its work shall not work its men over eight hours—is a wise law. It does not rest for its basis or justice upon whether the man who is doing the work is an alien or an American. It rests upon grand industrial reasons that were satisfactory to Congress when the law was adopted, and it is the law itself, it is the nature of the contract that the provision affects, and has nothing to do with the parentage or color or nationality of the man who is doing the work, and if it is dispensed with in Panama it may be dispensed with elsewhere after a while.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. As a matter of fact, in America almost all labor is governed by eight-hour rules, by negotiations between the unions and the employers. Would the gentleman then advocate breaking down that system by letting contracts for supplies upon the Isthmus to firms abroad who employ alien labor for more than eight hours a day?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is again trying to get from the one subject-matter to another. It seems to be this morning his favorite pursuit. I am talking about a law upon the statute books wherein the Government of the United States sets the example, with its persuasive power, to all other employers of labor in the way of employing labor for eight hours. So far as that example is persuasive so far it has force. It is in my opinion a good example. I think old Sir Matthew Hale, long before these latter-day industrial conditions arose, was wise in his division of a day into three parts: "Eight hours for sleep, eight hours for work, and eight hours for edification, recreation, and worship," and I think it is wise for the United States Government to do all that it can do, to wit: Just simply set an example. It is setting that example, and I do not want to break down that example in Panama or anywhere else.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will you not break down that example if you let contracts to foreign firms that employ foreign labor for ten or twelve hours a day and therefore can do work cheaper than American labor at eight hours a day?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the last remark of the gentleman has no pertinency at all to the matter I am discussing. Contractors might or might not work their men more than eight hours, and if it is better to build this canal by contract that is a minor consideration in a great question; but what I am contending for is that the Government of the United States as an employer of labor shall not set an example to them and to other people to work longer hours than eight hours any day. The gentleman would later on give work out by contract, probably—I have no doubt that he will have to come to that—and now he would, before that time, set an example to the contractors to work their men more than eight hours. Now, Mr. Chairman, this work after a while is going to be carried on in relays. This work is to be carried on all day and all night in order to economize in the use of the machinery. It will be best to have three relays of men working each eight hours, so that the three will work twenty-four hours and the work go on all the time.

I am unalterably opposed to the United States Government setting an example to the employers of labor, whether in Panama or anywhere else, of working their men longer than eight hours [applause], and I believe, moreover, Mr. Chairman—and there is no demagogue in me, I hope; I try at least to have none of it about me—but I believe that labor is more efficient, will do better work, work more intensely, more earnestly, and more efficiently when it is not overworked and when the hours are not too long. I believe that in almost every pursuit an honest man trying to work will turn out as much work in eight hours as he will in nine or ten. Not the first day, not the first week, but in the long run, because a man who is working nine and ten hours for months works down and has not the energy and ambition and working capacity of a man who works like the mischief the eight hours he is at work, but not working so long as to become absolutely paralyzed intellectually and physically with the drudgery of his pursuit.

Mr. LITTAUER. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will not the gentleman admit that the peculiar conditions existing at Panama demand some recognition here, even though we all agree upon the general proposition that eight hours should be the limit of a day's work here in the United States? Does he not recognize that it is in the first place difficult to get skilled mechanics and efficient common labor at the Isthmus, and there is a demand on the part of skilled mechanics who constantly implore the Commission that they should be permitted to work longer hours?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I never heard of anybody arguing for longer hours for labor or for child labor in factories or anything else oppressive who did not contend he was doing it at the request of the victims. It seems a wail is going up from all the children in all parts of the country to be allowed to work themselves into insanity in the factories of this country, and I suppose the wail is going up down there from men begging to be overworked. There is but one difference between the conditions there and the conditions here, and that is against your argument. That is that men can not work efficiently and energetically as many hours down in a tropical climate as they can in a temperate climate.

Mr. LITTAUER. Do they ever work in a tropical climate as energetically and efficiently as they do in a temperate climate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I think the general climatic conditions forbid a man working out in the sun as many hours or as long a time, and, generally speaking, if it is an unhealthful tropical climate like that at Panama the anæmic condition of the workman keeps him from being as efficient and as energetic a worker as another man would be in another climate. But that has nothing to do with this except to reenforce my argument.

Mr. DE ARMOND rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I desire to discuss the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has already discussed the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask permission to interrupt the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. As I came in I understood the gentleman in his argument to be discussing the example of the United States and so much of the proposed amendment to the bill as referred to the employment of men for more than eight hours by the United States Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under our existing law.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Well, that is the point. The existing law applies as much to the contractor and subcontractor on a public work of the United States as it does to the United States itself. And the abrogation of the law proposed in the bill reaches the contractor and subcontractor with as much force as it reaches the officers of the Government. Therefore a discussion which goes to oppose the Government's working men for more than eight hours and does not interpose the same objection against the contractor or subcontractor working them only partly opposes this amendment. In other words, it seems to express equal dissatisfaction with the present law as applicable to the Philippines as the committee expresses, only it is dissatisfaction with one part instead of the whole. Or does the gentleman oppose any modification of law and advocate keeping it as it is in its application to the subcontractor and the contractor, a point which I understood the gentleman to refuse to discuss?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the first place, I do not understand the law to be as it is stated by the gentleman from New Jersey. I am probably less of a lawyer than the gentleman from New Jersey, but I do not understand the law to be as he states it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will confine myself to this particular matter. I am trying to run out every other matter cognate or akin to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] yield the floor to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. For the present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One of the reasons assigned by Mr. Shonts in his testimony before the committee is that 80 per cent of the employees are aliens and never heard of the eight-hour law. If the logic of his argument were carried out then it would be proper not to apply the laws of the United States to all the aliens who came here, and simply because men had never heard of the right of trial by jury and the right of freedom of speech and freedom of religion it would be proper to suspend those laws in any territory controlled by the United States as well as to suspend this eight-hour law. While it is contended that the Isthmus is a perfectly healthful place at the present and men can work as long there as they can in the United States, or longer, I wish to read at this time an extract from the speech of Chairman Shonts, which was inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] yesterday. This speech was delivered Saturday at Cincinnati. Speaking of labor and the conditions on the Isthmus, he used this language:

> Experiment with the Italian laborers, while not made on a large scale, has not been satisfactory, for the reason that they did not seem possessed of great vitality, and succumb quickly to tropical fevers.

To-day in every part of the United States Italian laborers are doing the common laboring work of the country. They do possess great vitality. Perhaps they have not the same strength that men of other nationalities have, but from the Italian immigrants to-day the common laborers of the country are being obtained. And yet, according to Mr. Shonts himself, tropical fevers must be so prevalent there that these men can not successfully work on the Isthmus.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but does he not think that Mr. Shonts had in his mind the fact that the Italians were not acclimated, and also had in his mind the kind of laborers they are able to get in that tropical section that are more capable of standing the exigencies of the situation? I think the gentleman will find that is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be, perhaps, what was in the mind of Mr. Shonts, but what came out of his mouth is the language that I have read, and I have no means of telling what was in his mind.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think that if you will read his whole speech you will discover that fact running through it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be true; but in this speech he in other places said that they hoped to obtain a great proportion of the labor from the United States. They hope to get the skilled mechanics from here; they hope to bring the clerks and other civil employees from here.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. These are the day laborers that the gentleman has in mind now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. These are the day laborers. The fact is that the Italians who come to this country come from a more nearly tropical climate than ours, because the great mass of the Italian laborers in this country, unless I am misinformed, come from the southern part of Italy, and the climatic conditions there are more equal to the climatic conditions of the Isthmus than the climatic conditions of the northern parts of this country, where these men are to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DE ARMOND. For the purpose of discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlman has already discussed this amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I move to strike out the last word, or the last twenty words, if need be. I ask unanimous consent to have three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the committee for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] desired to divert, and apparently succeeded in diverting, the attention of the committee from the matter pending to a matter that is not pending, but will be in a moment. The gentleman from Iowa bases his observations upon the suggestion that to incorporate the amendment that I had the honor to offer would be to place the American laborer in a disadvantageous position. Now, the object of this amendment is to enable the American Government, as a purchaser, to obtain what we need, if we choose to buy from the American producer, the American manufacturer, as cheaply as the American manufacturers would sell the same things to any other government, to any other people, or to any individual carrying on this same great work. If the gentleman from Iowa, or any other gentleman, is really opposed to enabling the Government of the United States to buy as cheaply as the persons from whom the Government of the United States shall buy are willing to sell to foreigners who wish to buy, then I am perfectly willing that he should take that position. Now, I ask that the amendment be read in my time.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri will again be reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting a new paragraph, as follows:
"All purchases shall, so far as may be practicable, be made at prices and upon terms as favorable as those that Americans give to foreign customers."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 62.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Tellers!

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] will please take their places as tellers.

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The committee again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The provisions of the act entitled "An act relating to the limitations of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia," approved August 1, 1892, shall not apply in the construction of the isthmian canal within the Canal Zone.

Mr. McNARY. A point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make a point of order that the language on page 16, lines 3 to 8, inclusive, is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

At the Western Branch at Leavenworth, Kans.: For household, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1906, $7,000.

At the Danville Branch, Danville, Ill.: For household, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1906, $4,000.

For hospital, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1906, $3,500.

At the Mountain Branch, Johnson City, Tenn.: For transportation of members of the Home, $3,000.

For completion of coal shed, $1,000, and said coal shed may be constructed of steel or other suitable material.

At the Southern Branch, Hampton, Va.: For dredging and filling, $21,000.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether these items were properly apportioned; and if so, whether the officers having in charge these expenditures properly waived them. Just a statement as to how these deficiencies arose.

Mr. LITTAUER. In each one of these National Homes we were advised that the appropriation had been apportioned and waived under special circumstances, and the necessity for each one of these deficiencies was demonstrated to us.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And had been properly waived by the officer in charge in writing?

Mr. LITTAUER. They were apportioned; as to the proper waiver I must take them up singly. In the Danville Branch the apportionment was made in accordance with the provision of section 3679 of the Revised Statutes, and waived by the president of the Board of Managers.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. They were all waived properly. That is the only inquiry I have to make. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

State or Territorial Homes for Disabed Soldiers and Sailors: For continuing aid to State or Territorial Homes for the support of disabled volunteer soldiers, in conformity with the act approved August 27, 1888, including all classes of soldiers admissible to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, on account of the fiscal year 1905, $188,879.87: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home until its laws, rules, or regulations respecting the pensions of its inmates be made to conform to the provisions of section 4 of an act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act prescribing regulations for the Soldiers' Home located at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" but the above proviso shall not apply to any State or Territorial Home into which the wives or widows of soldiers are admitted and maintained: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home that maintains a bar or canteen where intoxicating liquors are sold.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, on page 18, line 2, I move to strike out the proviso that no part of this appropriation shall be appropriated for State or Territorial Homes where intoxicating liquors are sold.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, lines 2 to 5, inclusive, strike out the proviso which reads as follows: "And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home that maintains a bar or canteen where intoxicating liquors are sold."

Mr. LITTAUER. I beg to call the attention of the gentleman making this motion to the fact that this paragraph concerns a deficiency made in the year 1905, on account of that fiscal year, and that consequently his amendment would not seem to be in order in connection with that deficiency.

Mr. GOULDEN. Very well; I will withdraw the amendment now, but shall offer it later on the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment has been withdrawn, so that I have nothing to say. I am somewhat familiar with this provision in the statute, and am opposed to its being stricken out.

Mr. SHERLEY. I renew the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] is wrong in his suggestion. The limitation was put upon the money appropriated. It seems it was only sufficient for nine months; but that limitation put upon the previous appropriation certainly does not bear at all upon any subsequent or further appropriation required to carry on the expenses of the Home until July 30, 1906.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from New York has misunderstood his colleague in charge of the bill [Mr. LITTAUER]. This money has already been earned during the fiscal year 1905.

Mr. PERKINS. When did the fiscal year 1905 end?

Mr. TAWNEY. The fiscal year 1905 ended on the 30th of June last.

Mr. PERKINS. How was it earned?

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the provisions of law.

Mr. PERKINS. Under a prior act?

Mr. TAWNEY. The appropriation was not sufficient to meet the expenditure, and this is to make up the deficiency and to pay an amount earned during that fiscal year.

Mr. PERKINS. You refer to an amount that became due on June 30, 1905?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, I will take advantage of my motion to ask a further question which, perhaps, is not of importance now, but may be in the future. I ask the gentleman what is his observation, if he has any, as to the effect of doing away with the canteen in these Soldiers' Homes? Has it had the same effect that has been produced by doing way with the canteen in Army posts?

Mr. LITTAUER. As far as I have learned it has had that same effect, and I believe that in the future the provision ought to come out of the appropriation bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This provision has no reference to National Military Homes. It applies only to State homes, which admit the wives and widows of soldiers. An exception was wisely and properly made in relation to such homes. The gentleman from California [Mr. BELL], in the last Congress, made an argument that I regarded as unanswerable in favor of this provision as applicable to State homes. Those homes are constructed and maintained under State authority altogether. The Congress, in 1888, passed a law providing that $100 for each soldier maintained in a State home should be contributed from the Federal Treasury toward the maintenance of the soldiers, and I do not believe that Congress now ought to change in any way this benefaction or donation toward assisting the States in the maintenance of these institutions. But I want to disabuse the minds of gentlemen by stating that this provision applies only to State Homes and not to National Homes at all.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will you permit me, however, to call your attention to the fact that these provisos have all been observed in connection with the deficiency herein reported?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They ought to have been, in relation to State Homes.

Mr. LITTAUER. And they were, under the law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And properly so.

Mr. LITTAUER. And the appropriation was found to be short the amount herein stated?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly. I simply rose to say that this proviso had no reference or application to National Military Homes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The canteen is not prohibited in National Military Homes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; so that there is no question between the gentleman from New York and myself on that proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the amendment which was suggested on page 18 before the committee or has it been withdrawn?

Mr. TAWNEY. The amendment was withdrawn, and there is nothing now before the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 18, line 2, to strike out all the words, beginning with "And provided further," to the end of the paragraph. Now the gentleman can discuss his point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no point of order made against it.

Mr. SHERLEY. There was a suggestion that it would not be in order.

Mr. TAWNEY. The statement was made that an amendment would be of no effect, because this money has all been earned by the State Homes under the limitation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905. This is to pay the balance which the Government owes to these State Homes under the terms of the law, because the appropriations for that fiscal year were not large enough. That fiscal year expired June 30, 1905. This is an appropriation for that deficiency. This does not relate to the future of the Home or to this fiscal year or the next fiscal year.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that it does not, but it does give this House an opportunity to go on record on a very important matter. For that reason I desire to have the amendment passed upon by the committee. In that connection I desire to say simply this: The day has gone by when it ought to be necessary to discuss before an intelligent audience the merits or demerits of the canteen, either in the Army or the Soldiers' Home. If it was possible to surround an Army post or a Soldiers' Home with prohibition over so great an area that the inmates of the Home, or the men in the Army, could not obtain liquor, then there would at least be as much to be said in behalf of legislation abolishing the canteen as there would on the general question of prohibition. But the practical effect of such legislation is that it has turned the soldier in the Home and the soldiers in the Army from the canteen and forced him to go to houses of ill-repute, where he is not surrounded with restrictions and his appetite is unrestrained, where, instead of having any protection, he has ample opportunity to be intemperate and become the victim of drunkenness.

There is no man within the sound of my voice, with few exceptions, but believes that this is true, but, unfortunately, the statement once made by a Senator from my State that "whisky had no enemies in the cloakroom and no friends on the floor," seems to be frequently true, judging by the legislation of the House. [Laughter.] We have been hypocrites to permit ourselves to vote for legislation that in our secret souls we did not believe in, because of the pressure of misguided but good people on the outside, and I want to give this House an opportunity, as long as I am a Member of it, every time to vote on the question of whether we are to stifle our intelligence because of pressure that is brought to bear by temperance unions on the outside.

Mr TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I will say that it is immaterial whether his amendment is voted up or voted down. I do not think the gentleman obtains any expression of opinion in securing a vote on this proposition. If the gentleman will withdraw his amendment and offer it when it is proposed to appropriate for the next fiscal year for these State Homes, and the bill should carry this provision, then he will have an opportunity of testing the real sentiment of this House. But for myself it is immaterial how we vote on the proposition now, because the paragraph or proviso is entirely immaterial and would have been dropped out had it not been overlooked in the preparation of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is of some value for this House, the first chance it gets, to go on record against this specially hypocritical legislation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any information as to the operation of the canteen on Soliders' Homes, and particularly on institutions used by the several States and maintained by the States?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will answer that I have made no recent investigation, but when the subject was up for discussion last year and immediately subsequent to this legislation I did receive considerable information touching the matter, and that information went to show that what had been true in regard to the Army was true in regard to Soldiers' Homes—that the men were turned outside of the Homes to saloons, where they could get all the liquor they wanted and where they got drunk; that instead of drinking in the canteen, where there were proper restrictions, they went outside of the Homes and got into a worse condition of drunkenness than was ever known before.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Did the gentleman make any inquiry on the subject in relation to the State Homes?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am speaking of them.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me ask the gentleman if there is a State Home in his State?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not recall that there is. There is not in my district.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think there is not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, is it necessary to move to strike out the last word or the last two words?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has not yet been opposed. The gentleman is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very well. I have a suggestion I just want to make. I have not had the pleasure, although I have sat right exactly below my distinguished friend the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], of listening to his usual and customary assault on this legislation. I have assumed, however, that it is a repetition of the speech I frequently heard him make—that is, full of intemperate assertions, and, I undertake to say, ill-considered suggestions. Now, when the time comes and the sense of this House needs to be taken, I hope it will be under circumstances when we will get the sense of the House, and if they want to assail this legislation under proper conditions, we will try to be prepared to give the House some information on the question, and not ask the House to sit here and be dubbed as hypocrites by my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]—and I suppose he puts himself in the category, because he referred to "us"—and be influenced by inflammatory assertions such as my friend continually and always makes, induced undoubtedly to a large extent by the territory from which he happens to come, and possibly my view may be induced to a large extent by the territory from which I happen to come. But when the time comes, when it is properly in order and we can discuss this, we will endeavor to give the House some information on this question, so that it can act intelligently and not act on the spur of the moment. I hope that the gentleman's amendment, under these circumstances, will be voted down, and that we will not reverse the policy of this House which it has adopted for the last two or three sessions, although I agree with the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], that the vote under these circumstances is not particularly significant one way or the other. When the time comes, however, I shall be very glad to go over the matter carefully with my friend.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, doubtless the House appreciates that it is unwise in ever taking any action without a final, exhaustive statement from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]. I am exceedingly sorry that any views I may have and may see fit to express should meet with the severe condemnation and arraignment of the distinguished gentleman. Notwithstanding his attempt to impugn my motive because of the district I represent, notwithstanding the statement that my arguments are ill conceived and are not the result of that reflection which always characterizes the distinguished gentleman when he makes a speech, I still submit to the House that this is not a new question. It is not a question, even, that is necessarily confined for its proper determination to the wisdom of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], and it did seem to me that it was proper that this House should now consider this, even if it has no practical effect. The moral effect of the committee's action would be great. I have tried not to be intemperate on the matter.

The gentleman says I speak always on the subject. I have never spoken before on the subject save once when the matter was brought into the House by the amendment that was put on the bill last year by the gentleman from California [Mr. BELL], and I doubt if there is a gentleman in this House who has been more persistent in his views of prohibition and who has flaunted them more repeatedly in the face of the House than the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]. Nobody took exception; nobody impugned his motives. I am willing to concede that he is perfectly sincere; that the fact that his district is a prohibition district and the political sentiment is in favor of prohibition has nothing to do with his motives. I would not be guilty of making the inference that he makes to those who differ from him; but this is aside from the question.

It is the first time that I have had occasion to make what might be called a "personal" reply relative to any position I may take. In my statement that the House had been hypocritical I did not have the distinguished gentleman in mind. It is possible to sometimes think of the House without having him in mind. I do know that a lot of us have been hypocritical about a lot of questions, and it seemed to me only fair and frank to say so.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to enter into a discussion of this question at this time on account of the position taken by the Committee on Appropriations that it is not in order, but as a member of the board of the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home for the past five years, I possess practical information which at the proper time I shall gladly give to the House. I desire to say at this time that it has been the law to allow these canteens to be conducted in State Homes as they are in the National Homes since their establishment. Two years ago the gentleman from California [Mr. BELL] made a statement here which was afterwards verified by myself, that at the Home in California the canteen was badly conducted—in fact, was a disgrace. Hence, at the time I permitted the gentleman from California to introduce that rider to the appropriation bill and did not oppose it. I will at the proper time give the resolutions adopted by the board of trustees of the New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, as well as the views of the officials connected with that Home. I simply give this information to the House now for the information of the Members and serve notice that I shall at the proper time fully discuss the subject, giving good and convincing reasons for the proposed reestablishment of the canteen in the State Homes for the soldiers and sailors of the civil war.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, I heard the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] say that there were no State Homes in the State of Kentucky, and therefore he can not have any personal information unless he has investigated outside of that State as to the condition of affairs relative to the sale or use of liquors in State Homes. I desire, however, to say a word in corroboration of what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] has advanced, because I have information from the Soldiers' Home there which will sustain the position that he has maintained. Two or three years ago I sent my partner to Togus, Me., to the Soldiers' Home located there, for the purpose of taking a deposition. In order to reach that place it is necessary to take a steamer and go up the Kennebec River. That steamer had perhaps half a dozen passengers on board, but it was loaded down with liquors for the Soldiers' Home. When he arrived there to his astonishment he found on the grounds of that Home a canteen and a stream of old veterans constantly passing in to obtain liquor, and, still more to his surprise, he found upon the other side of the State, within the precincts of the Soldiers' Home, a Keeley cure. On one side they were making drunkards and on the other side they were trying to cure them of drunkenness.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In what State does that exist?

Mr. TIRRELL. In the State of Maine. I think that statement alone of such a disgraceful condition of things, partially authorized at least by our Government, is sufficient to vote down any amendment to strike out this clause of the bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I want the committee to distinctly understand, whether they vote for or against this amendment, that such action can not in any way prejudice the deficiency that exists and is provided for in this paragraph under the law. I personally sympathize with the objects of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I hope that some day I may be able to vote in an effective manner to carry out his stated purpose. [Applause.] But what is the use at this time of striking into the empty air?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is no connection between the provision of this section and the question of the Army canteen to which attention has been called by the gentleman from Kentucky. The question of the Army canteen is one entirely foreign to this proposition. The Soldiers' Homes are eleemosynary institutions, charitable institutions, and there is no sense in claiming that because there are old soldiers who desire and deserve to attend these charitable institutions the Government and the State should maintain a bar at which they can get their drinks. The condition of the American soldier is an entirely different situation. If it is true that cutting out the Army canteen has resulted in drunkenness among the American soldiery, as the gentleman from Kentucky intimates, we should give the matter our immediate and thoughtful attention. But that is not the question here. We take care of those old soldiers in these institutions because they have not the means with which to provide for themselves, and it is perfectly ridiculous for the gentleman from Kentucky or any other State in the Union to stand up and say we can not maintain order and keep these people from getting drunk unless we maintain a bar for them. If we can not keep them in health and comfort without maintaining a bar, if they can not lead orderly and sober lives there when they are cared for at the expense of the Government and the State, they should be permitted to go forth and look for themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute to the amendment on page 17, line 17, to strike out after the word "cents" the remainder of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all the paragraph beginning with the word "Provided" on line 17, page 17, down to and including the word "sold," line 5, page 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What is the purpose of the substitute to the amendment?

Mr. TAWNEY. The purpose of the substitute is to strike out the language of the bill which is entirely immaterial. It is the custom in reporting a deficiency appropriation to quote the entire law under which the original appropriation was made. My amendment simply eliminates the language that is not material, because it relates to a deficiency that occurred in the fiscal year 1905.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman another question. Does your substitute include this language, "that no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home," etc.?

Mr. TAWNEY. It strikes that out; but I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania this—he does not understand it——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I want to understand it; that is my purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. If you will give me your attention for a moment——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I can listen with the side of my head toward the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. The appropriation for the fiscal year 1905 was not sufficient to meet the obligations of the Government to these State Homes. Now that fiscal year has passed. This money has been earned by all the State Homes, and we are now appropriating for that deficiency.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the bill reported from the committee contained the provision that there should be no further rum in these Homes. If the gentleman will look or listen——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota give attention to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. When the committee reported this bill the committee evidently intended that the provision which has been discussed for five or ten minutes should become a law. Do you propose now to strike it out?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is the law to-day.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Then why do you include it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because, as I stated at the outset, it is the custom in reporting deficiency appropriations to repeat the language of the original appropriation.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is always clear and polite in his statements. Now, let me ask him a question further. Does the condition proposed in this bill now prevail at these Homes?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. And if this item succeeds, will this be the result, that no part of the appropriation made shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial Home that maintains a bar or canteen where intoxicating liquors are sold?

Mr. TAWNEY. It will be apportioned just as the law stands to-day.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. But my friend can answer the question yes or no and satisfy me.

Mr. TAWNEY. It will be apportioned to Homes only that comply with the law as it stands on the statute book to-day.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Then there is no occasion for this provision. We already have the prohibitory law.

Mr. TAWNEY. None at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have been recognized.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I just wanted to ask one question. The amount of it is this: There is no deficiency, nor money to be used, in any State Home in which there is a bar or canteen?

Mr. TAWNEY. None whatever.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Therefore this appropriation will go exactly as a limitation upon the original appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly it does; and that limitation stands as a law until it is repealed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is recognized.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in his interpretation of the legal effect of his proposed amendment. This paragraph contains an appropriation to cover a deficiency that occurred during the fiscal year 1905, a year that has already passed and gone, so an appropriation covering that deficiency, without containing the limitations that were upon the original appropriation bill, probably would have been sufficient. But since the committee has seen fit to report the appropriation with the conditions contained in the original bill, and in view of the argument made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that action here would have some moral effect, it may be construed by managers of Soldiers' Homes and by the public generally that it is the judgment of Congress that State Soldiers' Homes ought to be permitted to maintain canteens. The question is now so presented that this committee can not strike out the limitations upon the appropriation without having its action construed to mean that, in the judgment of the committee or the House of Representatives, the canteen ought to be reestablished and maintained at State Soldiers' Homes.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman kindly yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; for a question.

Mr. PERKINS. Suppose the committee, when they reported the bill, had omitted the section which is confessedly surplusage. What harm would it have done?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. None at all.

Mr. PERKINS. Then what harm is done by striking out the surplusage now?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Simply because, Mr. Chairman, the argument has been made that this provision which the gentleman from New York denominates as surplusage ought to go out for the moral effect upon the country, to let the country know that it is the opinion of Congress that it was a mistake to abolish the canteen in State Soldiers' Homes. I have the honor to represent a district in the State of Indiana in which is located a Soldiers' Home that allows the wives and widows of veterans of the civil war to find shelter and protection, and the law of the State of Indiana prohibits the establishment and maintenance of saloons within a mile of that institution. This provision might go out without affecting the State Soldiers' Home at Lafayette, Ind. But I do believe, Mr. Chairman, in view of the argument that was made and the action of Congress a year ago and two years ago upon this question, that that action should not be reversed now, and the House ought to take no action that might be construed as a change of its judgment on the question until there has been a full, free, and thorough investigation and until we have had more information in respect to the influence of canteens upon these splendid institutions than we now have. Therefore I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota. The provision he seeks to strike out was put in originally largely through the influence of Governor Lind, who represented the capital district in the State of Minnesota in the last Congress. I object to the amendment on account of the effect it would have—the interpretation the public would put on the action of Congress in this particular—and I sincerely hope it will be voted down.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana this question, so as to fix the effect of his argument before the committee. I understand your position to be this: That while it may be true, as a matter of law, in undertaking to control the disposition of this appropriation that it may not have been necessary for the committee to introduce this matter in the urgent deficiency bill, inasmuch as my distinguished friend from Kentucky raised the position that any construction by the committee would be regarded as a formal expression on the part of the House adverse to the legislation, and whether it had any effect or not it would look that action had been taken. Your view is that the construction that the country will get and the idea the men in the Homes will get will be the idea that the House is adversely inclined to this restriction.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman has stated my views with admirable precision and clearness and much better than I could have said it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say that if inadvertently I impugned the motives of the gentleman, my friend, a few moments ago I regret it very much. It seems to me that there is a great deal of force in the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana. I do not think, after the explanation of the chairman of the committee, that this language is necessary. I am inclined to think that this urgent deficiency bill would have acted precisely as the appropriation carried before, but inasmuch as it was in the bill, I do not see how the House can avoid being placed on record, under these circumstances, if it goes out.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, if it is to be considered as being adverse to this restriction upon the maintenance of canteens in State Homes, the gentleman from Vermont very appropriately said, and my distinguished friend thinks it does not affect the condition of the anticanteen with reference to the United States Army, but simply relates to the State Homes—we have none of them in my State and I know nothing about it. The people that do have them think it very unwise to allow a bar to be maintained by the people running these Homes; and that is the purpose of this restriction. Under these circumstances, while it may not be effective legislation on account of the moral effect that it would have, I certainly hope the House will decline to sustain the amendment and let the proviso stand exactly as it is.

Mr. TAWNEY. I wish to say that my purpose in offering this substitute for this paragraph was, if any of it should be eliminated, to eliminate all; but inasmuch as the Members of the House think that the construction of this provision is going to create an impression here or elsewhere as to what the impression and sentiment of this House is on the subject, I withdraw my amendment. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, to strike out on page 18——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of saying that I want to suggest——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has once been heard.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not going to debate the question. If the Chair will indulge me a few moments he will see that I am facilitating the committee and not handicapping it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to say that inasmuch as some Members whose views accord with mine on this question do not feel it is wise to raise the question, whether it would have any practical effect, I withdraw the amendment I offered. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be withdrawn. The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to complete the distribution of the medals commemorative of the naval and other engagements in the waters of the West Indies and on the shores of Cuba, to the officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps who participated in any of said engagements, as provided by public resolution No. 17, approved March 3, 1901, $10,000: Provided, That the medals herein authorized shall be delivered to the person entitled to the same at the place where he is located at the time of presenting the same.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 19, and insert the following: "Provided, That the medals herein authorized shall be delivered at the place of residence to the person entitled to the same."

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia give his attention? Does the gentleman intend to strike out the proviso and insert what he sent up in its stead?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is so understood.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CURTIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1365. An act providing for the placing of an elevator in the public building at Boise, Idaho.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

Coal and transportation: Purchase of coal and other fuel for steamers and ships' use, and other equipment purposes, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same, and for the general maintenance of naval coaling depots and coaling plants for the fiscal years as follows:

For the fiscal year 1906, $500,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, line 6, add: "Provided, That the amount hereby appropriated shall be expended without regard to the provisions of an act approved April 28, 1904, entitled 'An act to require the employment of vessels of the United States for public purposes.'"

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment that it is a change of existing law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, all I wish to say on the point of order is that this amendment is a limitation upon the expenditure of this appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. It may be a limitation, but still it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is out of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of said sum herein appropriated shall be used for the payment of transportation charges upon American vessels where said transportation charges are more than 20 per cent in excess of similar transportation charges upon foreign vessels.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order against that amendment for the same reason as before.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman from New York withhold his point of order for a minute? I should like to be heard on the amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman desire to have me reserve the point of order?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I think that this amendment is only a limitation upon the appropriation, and I am inclined to think the Chair will say that; but still the Chair is better informed upon questions of that character than I am, and hence I am going to leave that part of the work to him.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Arkansas point the Chair to the statute upon this subject?

Mr. MACON. This simply seeks to limit the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Not the amendment which the gentleman has submitted; but is there not a general statute upon the subject of carrying coal in American vessels?

Mr. MACON. There is a statute which provides that it shall be carried in American vessels, and I do not seek to say in this amendment that it shall not be carried in American vessels; but I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations it was shown that before Congress passed a law requiring coal to be transported upon American vessels—and we had the right to transport it upon foreign vessels—the price charged was only $4.50 a ton. Since the passage of this law requiring the coal to be transported upon American vessels it has gone up 75 per cent, or, in other words, we have to pay at this good day and hour the sum of $7.50 per ton. That, sir, in my judgment, works a great wrong upon the American people; and while they are willing to contribute something toward the building up of American vessels, I do not think they are willing to pay as much as 75 per cent extra for that purpose. I know it is not just to require them to do so. Therefore my amendment seeks to limit this appropriation to the point that whenever an American vessel will not carry coal for a sum not in excess of 20 per cent of the charge made by a foreign vessel, then no part of the appropriation shall be paid to such American vessel. It certainly will open their eyes and awaken them to a proper sense of the situation and cause them to be reasonable in their charges for the transportation of coal. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes that the proviso offered by the gentleman from Arkansas may be a change of the statute of April 28, 1904, which is as follows:

[Public—No. 198.]

An act to require the employment of vessels of the United States for public purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That vessels of the United States or belonging to the United States, and no others, shall be employed in the transportation by sea of coal, provisions, fodder, or supplies of any description, purchased pursuant to law, for the use of the Army or Navy unless the President shall find that the rates of freight charges by said vessels are excessive and unreasonable, in which case contracts shall be made under the law as it now exists: Provided, That no greater charges be made by such vessels for transportation of articles for the use of the said Army and Navy than are made by such vessels for transportation of like goods for private parties or companies.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect sixty days after its passage.

Approved April 28, 1904.

Of course the Chair does not desire to become involved in a discussion of the question of fact as to whether American vessels charge more than 20 per cent in excess of the amount charged for like service by foreign vessels, but believing that the amendment offered by the gentleman may work a change in existing law, the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in the transportation of coal except upon contracts to the lowest bidders after due advertisement inviting full and free competition from all sources, and if it appears from said bids that the discrepancy in charges is more than 10 per cent higher in American bottoms the facts shall be laid before the President for his opinion as to whether the charges are not excessive and unreasonable.

Mr. LITTAUER. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to be heard, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order. Mr. Chairman, the law referred to by the Chair just now provides that—

Vessels of the United States, or belonging to the United States, and no others, shall be employed in the transportation by sea of coal, provisions, fodder, or supplies of any description, purchased pursuant to law, for the use of the Army or Navy unless the President shall find that the rates of freight charges by said vessels are excessive and unreasonable, in which case contracts shall be made under the law as it now exists: Provided, That no greater charges be made by such vessels for transportation of articles for the use of the said Army and Navy than are made by such vessels for transportation of like goods for private parties or companies.

The amendment which I send to the desk provides that when the evidence shows that the charges for carrying coal in American bottoms is more than 10 per cent of what it would be if put out to competitive bids the facts shall be laid before the President in order that he may decide as to whether the charges by the owners of the American ships are unreasonable. The amendment does not change existing law. It simply directs that the bureau chief shall lay the facts before the President in order that he, in compliance with this law, may decide whether the charges are excessive and unreasonable. If he holds that they are excessive, then the law which was enacted more than a year ago directs that the contract need not be given to American ships. That is all, Mr. Chairman, I care to say on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. For the same reasons the Chair gave in the previous ruling the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill what is this $710,000 for?

Mr. LITTAUER. The entire appropriation is $710,000, composed of $210,000 which represents a deficiency for 1905.

Mr. PERKINS. Deficiency in what?

Mr. LITTAUER. Deficiency certified to by the Department for the purchase of coal and its transportation, and $500,000 represents an anticipated deficiency during the present fiscal year, the apportionments having been made and waived by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PERKINS. Does it include coal and the transportation of coal for the Philippines?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; in part coal and in part transportation to the Philippines, the Asiatic stations, and to coal depositories along the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York an explanation of this deficiency. Have there been any unforeseen conditions since the original appropriation was made for the year 1906? And, if so, I would be glad if the gentleman would give the House the benefit of his information.

Mr. LITTAUER. Is the gentleman referring now to the deficiency for 1905 or for the current fiscal year?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. For both; I see that one follows the other.

Mr. LITTAUER. For 1905 the explanation is that that amount of coal was purchased and was transported, and that there is $210,000 now due because thereof. The 1906 deficiency, which is controlled by the new law demanding an apportionment. The apportionment has been waived for the reasons that the amount of coal in the Philippines station had run very low, and it was necessary to replenish it, and in addition because many coaling stations had been established along our coast, in the West Indies, at Guantanamo, San Juan, Narragansett Bay, and Key West. The Department thought it necessary to accumulate a stock of coal at these places, and in consequence the appropriation of $2,750,000 was not sufficient. The Department submitted an anticipated deficiency of $1,250,000, which in our judgment was excessive. We determined that $500,000 would be quite enough to carry out the administration of this fund during the current fiscal year, and so recommended to the House.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman mean by that statement that the Department has seen fit, or necessity has arisen, to purchase more coal than the Department originally recommended, or has this deficiency been caused in part, and if so, what part, by the increased price in the transportation rates?

Mr. LITTAUER. Both of these deficiencies have in part been caused by the increased price of transportation rates.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. That is a point on which I would like to have an explanation. What part has been caused by increased price of transportation?

Mr. LITTAUER. We were advised that during the year 1905 50,000 tons were transported to the Asiatic stations, the Philippines, and others at an increased cost of about $2.62½ a ton on the average. During 1905 coal which had cost $662,000, at the rate of $2.50 per ton alongside the wharf, cost for transportation $930,000, and this increased expenditure was caused because of the law requiring transportation in American ships.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Is it a fact, as has been stated here this afternoon by another Member, that the increased price in transportation per ton has been in the neighborhood of $3?

Mr. LITTAUER. It was increased, as we were informed, from about $4.87½ a ton to $7 or $7.50 a ton under the operation of law.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Something over $2.50 per ton, owing to that law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. That amounts to how much in a year?

Mr. LITTAUER. I can only tell the gentleman that during the year 1905 we were informed that 50,000 tons of coal were so transported.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. During that year the increase must have been something over $120,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; the deficiency asked for is $210,000.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Has the gentleman or his committee anything to recommend to relieve such a situation?

Mr. LITTAUER. Simply the amendment which the committee has proposed to insert in the last paragraph of this bill, amending section 3797, which will restrict the waiver of appropriation in the future as far as we believe good administration will permit.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Nothing in that amendment will tend to reduce the price of transportation on coal, will it, or relieve the necessity of shipping in American bottoms, although the increased price is $2.50 a ton?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Appropriations Committee is not constantly concerned with the change of existing laws. If the Naval Committee desires to take up such a matter and correct the abuses that become evident under the operation of law, it has its opportunity in turn.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I desire to state to the gentleman that my recollection is that this original law which caused this great increase in transportation rates did not come from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LITTAUER. No; I believe it came from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I am not prepared to state. It seems to me a very grievous error.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert at the end of line 6, page 19, the words: "Provided, That no part of the amount hereby appropriated shall be expended for transporting coal between New York, N. Y., and Manila, P. I., at a rate greater than $5 a ton."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment. It changes existing law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is clearly a limitation upon this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any present statutory provision upon the subject?

Mr. FITZGERALD. None other than the law.

Mr. LITTAUER. This is fixing a price for work now already provided for by law.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The discretion as to which is expressly vested in the President, and this deprives him of that discretion.

Mr. LITTAUER. It seems to me that we already have a provision of law placing it within the discretion of the President to make any exceptions when coal shall not be transported in American bottoms.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] point me to any statute relating to this transportation other than the one to which he has referred? The Chair rather inclines to the opinion that this is a limitation.

Mr. LITTAUER. I ask, then, that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection; and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this is an important question. It transpired in the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations that so long as it had been possible to accept bids of foreign shipowners it was possible to transport coal from Atlantic coast ports to Manila for $4.50 a ton. The highest price ever paid while it was possible to transport in foreign bottoms was $4.87½ a ton. On the 28th of April, 1904, a law was enacted providing "that vessels of the United States or belonging to the United States, and no others, should be used in the transportation by sea of coal, provisions, fodder, or supplies of any description purchased pursuant to the law for the use of the Army and Navy, unless the President shall find that the rates of freight charges by said vessels are unreasonable and excessive."

After that law went into effect and it became necessary to transport coal in American vessels the cost of transporting coal from Atlantic coast ports to Manila increased from $4.50 a ton to $7.50 a ton. The next item in this bill is an appropriation of $210,000 for transportation of coal for the fiscal year 1905. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars of that sum is required because of the passage of the law just mentioned. During the fiscal year 1905 144,000 tons of coal were sent from New York to the Philippine Islands. Ninety thousand tons were sent in foreign bottoms at $4.50 a ton and 50,000 tons were sent in American bottoms at $7.50 a ton. Coal that cost the Government of the United States and this country about $360,000 cost to transport to the Philippine Islands $900,000, and if this law had been in effect, so that the 90,000 tons transported in foreign bottoms had been transported in American bottoms, it would have cost more than $1,200,000 to transport $360,000 worth of coal to Manila. This law of April 28, 1904, provides that American vessels shall be used unless the President shall find the price excessive.

The Chief of the Bureau of Equipment testified that his Bureau is to-day receiving bids from foreign shipowners to transport this coal at $4.50 a ton. He also states that it is unnecessary for American shipowners to enter a combination, because the prices that they are now charging the Government are so high that there is no necessity for a combination to take advantage of the Government. If this amendment be adopted it will enable the American shipowners to obtain an increase over the price that foreign shipowners are willing to charge of 50 cents a ton. This is about an 11 per cent increase. There is nothing in this law which shows how great an increase in the cost will be considered unreasonable, and, whatever excuse there may be for legislation to encourage the American merchant marine, I am unable to see any justification for appropriations that, under the operations of this act, compel the great mass of the American people to contribute to the enrichment of a very restricted class of citizens owning ships. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment be adopted, instead of using the $500,000 provided in the item now before the House, it is very likely that at least $250,000 will be saved to the Government. I am not aware that the country is in such a prosperous condition that we can afford to pay these excessive prices and to squander money in this way.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment be adopted I do not believe that the Government would save one cent. The only object of the amendment is an attempt by the gentleman from New York to limit the shipment of coal from the port of New York. His amendment declares that only $5 per ton shall be paid on the shipment of coal from New York, N. Y., to Manila, P. I. Now, coal is generally shipped from other ports than New York, N. Y. Our principal ports of coal supply are the Chesapeake Bay, Baltimore, Newport News, and Lamberts Point, consequently it amounts simply to an attempt at a limitation in connection with the port of New York, N. Y.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I will change the amendment I sent up.

Mr. LITTAUER. And I do not believe that the object sought to be achieved here would be anything but a matter of bothera-tion to the Department; that it would achieve no good result. We have a law which specifically states that this coal is to be transported in American bottoms——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And the price is regulated in the discretion of the President.

Mr. LITTAUER. And the price is regulated within the discretion of the President as far as the application of the law goes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York withdrawing his amendment and substituting another in its place? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. Now, will the gentleman submit the amendment in the form he desires?

Insert after "New York" the words "and other ports on the Atlantic coast of the United States."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rose to oppose this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will dispose of the point of order first.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the Chair will sustain the point of order and relieve me of the responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN. The modified amendment does not change the amendment, it seems to the Chair, and the point of order is overruled.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted it will not, in my opinion, affect the efficiency in any way of the naval establishment. The hearings before the Committee on Appropriations show that at the beginning of the present fiscal year there were at Manila only 7,000 tons of coal. Since that time the Department has sent to Manila enough coal to furnish our ships with what they needed and to provide a depot there with a surplus of from sixty to seventy thousand tons of coal. There is now that quantity at Manila—more than sufficient to answer all of our purposes at the place during the present fiscal year even if not another ton is sent there.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say that that is the judgment also of the Committee on Appropriations, and one of the reasons why we reduced the estimates.

Mr. RIXEY. I am glad to hear the statement of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. How much coal did the gentleman say the Government now has at Manila?

Mr. TAWNEY. Sixty thousand to 70,000 tons.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That is a good bit of coal.

Mr. RIXEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the statement of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee that we have that quantity of coal there, and that it is more than enough to carry us until the 1st day of July, 1906. Therefore there is no necessity for us to hire any more American ships during this year to carry the coal to Manila at an exorbitant price. If these American ships are willing to carry it there at a dollar a ton more than we pay to foreign ships, then there is no prohibition upon the Department preventing it from adding to this supply, already large enough however; but if the American bottoms will not carry the coal to the Philippine Islands for $5 a ton, which is $1 per ton more than it would cost in foreign bottoms, and more than we paid when the present law went into operation, then the Department would not be embarrassed, because we have sufficient coal there to answer our purpose until after the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to some testimony in the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. On page 107 Admiral Manney states:

We have to continue the purchase, but not to such an extent. For instance, at Manila 9,000 tons a month is about what they draw on the Cavite station. But when we are stocking up, putting in 70,000 tons a year where there was but 7,000 tons, the expenditure is greater than when we were just keeping up the supply.

Mr. RIXEY. Will not the gentleman also refer to page 106, where the statement is made:

And that increased the deposit to between 60,000 and 70,000 tons, which amount we now have there.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is not sufficient at the rate of 9,000 tons a month.

Mr. RIXEY. To carry us until July? I think so.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is, of course; but we can not permit our entire coal supply there to be wiped out. The gentleman knows that it takes months to replenish it. Any accident on the way might delay or injure the service of the Navy.

Mr. RIXEY. If we did not get another ton there between this time and the 1st of July, we would have then more coal in the Philippine Islands than was there the 1st day of last July.

Mr. LITTAUER. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. RIXEY. We can not afford to go on piling up this coal at Manila at this enormous cost of transportation and to the extent that the Navy Department wishes. For instance, in the hearings it is stated that the General Board of the Navy Department recommends that there should be a depot there with a stock on hand of 200,000 tons. Unless some protection is afforded against exorbitant charges for freight we should call a halt, and we can do so and still have at Manila a sufficient supply for all purposes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentlemen in this House who hold that the rehabilitation of the merchant marine is one of the greatest and most important problems before the country to-day; but the statement was made before the Naval Committee by Admiral Manney that since the law went into operation providing that coal should only be shipped in American bottoms the number of ships at the service of the Government was less than when the law went into operation. He stated that the American steamers had so much of other business to attend to that they did not care for this; that there was practically no competition; and it is the opinion, so far as I can see, of the bureau chiefs that there ought to be some provision made by Congress which would protect the Government against extortionate freight charges and bring some competition in the bids. This unrestricted law that all coal for the Government shall be carried in American bottoms seems not to build up the merchant marine, but does cost many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and there should be some limit fixed for the protection of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] would understand this entire question he would not favor the amendment that he has proposed. I speak only on one phase of the question, leaving the discussion of the fairness or unfairness of the prices asked by the American ships for this transportation to other gentlemen. If I wanted to close up all the mines of the American continent from New York to Galveston, situated upon all the streams emptying into the Atlantic ocean, so as to stop their output from going to the oriental markets, I would favor this amendment; for not one ton of coal will ever be shipped to the Orient if that sort of limitation is put upon it, and for the manifest reason that an abundance of coal is to be had right on the line of these ships at a price far below what it would cost to carry it from the American mines at the price the gentleman is proposing. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company understands the situation tolerably well, and is operating eight large ships, four very fine large ships, and buy their coal not even at San Francisco. They buy it at Nagasaki, Hongkong, and other points.

The ship on which the Taft party came home—the Korea—one of the finest ships in the Pacific Ocean, and, by the way, the whole line is about to be sold out, practically, to the Japanese Government; and furthermore, the Oceanic Line with them, so that our flag will go entirely off the Pacific Ocean in a very short time if these contracts are carried out. That ship upon which we traveled took in its coal at Nagasaki—2,500 tons. It cost on board the ship trimmed and ready for our departure, less than $7 a ton. I will say to the gentleman that coal was put on board by the labor of 1,200 men, women, and children. They began at 9 o'clock in the morning and finished about 7 o'clock in the evening. The process was astonishing to every American on board that ship.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if this coal——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me finish my statement. The coal was brought to the ship in different barges. Each barge had its narrow point against the ship, and the discharge of the coal from these barges occupied almost the entire length of the ship, and 1,200 men, women, and children—and a great many of them women—handed that coal in baskets up the sides of the ship, then on board the ship, and trimmed it in the bunkers of the ship. This was done by labor at the cost of 15 cents a day to the women and 25 cents a day to the best men, making about 20 or 23 cents a day for the labor. That was the coal that brought our ship over and that was the coal that would take the same ship back again. Now, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RIXEY. I am a little surprised that the gentleman would come on a ship where the coal was furnished from some other country.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Walking was a little troublesome. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask the gentleman what country this coal came from?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, it came from Japan.

Mr. RIXEY. Was it coal that was mined in Japan or in some other country?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I presume it was mined in Japan; there are great quantities of coal in Japan. I want the gentleman to know that this was an American ship under an American register, and I will want to say further to him that it is one of the last of our ships that fly the American flag on the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. RIXEY. I want to read to the gentleman what the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment said in reply to a question on coal supply:

The native coal of Japan is not a good quality of coal for military purposes. It is hard on the boilers and makes so much smoke as to interfere with ship maneuvering and signals.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have said nothing about that.

Mr. RIXEY. I think the gentleman has stated that we could use coal from Japan.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not; but every ship carrying the American flag on the Pacific is using it.

Mr. RIXEY. But here is what the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment says about its quality.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the gentleman must not presume that I do not know something of the character of coal. More than one-third of all the coal products of Ohio is produced in my Congressional district; so when I am talking about coal I know something about what I am talking about.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he would favor this amendment under certain conditions?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not say anything of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I would like to have gentlemen let me alone unless they have something to talk about.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to state that he would favor such an amendment if it would have the effect of preventing ships of another country carrying this coal.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I said if I wanted to stop all the coal traffic of the United States in this direction I would vote for such an amendment as that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am trying to make myself understood, and the gentleman need not catechise me about it. I think everybody knows what I am trying to get at.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not understand anything that the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from New York is not responsible for that condition of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I think he is. What I have been trying to say was that this was to put a stumbling block, an impediment in the way of the traffic in American coal that ought not to be permitted, and I wanted to say—and that is what I took the floor for—this whole question of limitation upon freight rates between the United States and the Philippine Islands is a question that has been under discussion in the two committees of the House and Senate having these matters in charge, for seven years. In my opinion it is probable they made a mistake in the passage of the bill in the last session of Congress, in extending the navigation laws of the United States to the Philippine Islands at so early a date as we put them, and whatever the committee may do—I can not speak for them—I shall advocate a postponement over to the end of the treaty time of 1909, so that the competition that seems to be strangled by the operation of the law of last year shall be gotten rid of. Therefore, in the meantime, it seems to me that it is ill advised for us to undertake, in an appropriation bill, and an emergency deficiency bill at that, to fix rates upon the transportation of coal. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I should like to have the opinion of the gentleman upon this proposition: The amendment proposes to fix the rates from Atlantic ports in the United States to the Philippine Islands. What is the gentleman's information as to that proposition violating the post-preference clause of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is clearly unconstitutional, and not alone unconstitutional, but clearly wrong and discriminative in its character and ought not for a moment be considered. I do not know exactly what the coal facilities of the Pacific coast may be—how rapidly coal can be gotten to a shipping point on the Pacific coast; but if it should so happen that it is available to deliver this coal to a shipping point on the Pacific Ocean and you then undertake to strangle it by this legislation upon the Atlantic coast, you have clearly violated the law in the first place and you have violated propriety in the second place.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know whether the port of Philadelphia or the port of Baltimore can be technically called Atlantic ports, because they are not on the ocean.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Neither can New Orleans be called an Atlantic port.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It seems to me it is quite clearly a violation of the post-preference clause of the Constitution.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And out of New Orleans can be brought the mighty coal supplies of the Ohio and Tennessee and Kentucky rivers.

If the gentleman will allow me to say a single word and then I am through, this legislation ought to be carefully considered by the committees of the House and not put in here in the form of an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, in regard to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has just said, I desire to call his attention to the fact that the purpose of this resolution is not to require the Government to purchase coal in the open market, or to purchase Welsh coal, or any other, but it merely affects the transportation of coal from this country to Asiatic ports.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is very true; but whenever you interfere with the rate of transportation you have interfered with the propriety of purchase.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. But the gentleman will understand that the normal rate of transportation before the passage of the act of April 28, 1904, was much less than the limitation carried by this amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I disagree utterly with the reports that have come to us upon this subject.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. According to all the testimony. Another thing, I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say that he would favor this amendment if he desired to close up all the mines on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So far as oriental traffic is concerned.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman seriously intend this House to understand that the purchase in a foreign country of all the coal necessary at Manila would perceptibly affect the mines of this country?

Mr. GROSVENOR. My statement was that if we wanted to close up the mines of the United States, so far as the oriental traffic was concerned, it wouldn't amount to a drop in the bucket.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I understood the gentleman to leave the impression that the adoption of this amendment would have a tendency to close up the mines.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It would not close a single mine.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Of course it would not, and it would not appreciably affect the mines of this country. The real question is whether it would not be better for the United States, the people at large, to adopt this amendment. The Department claims that at Manila something like 100,000 tons a year are needed. Now, the purpose of this amendment is to get that coal transported from this country at $5 a ton instead of $7.50 a ton. The gentleman from Virginia has well stated that even if during the remainder of this fiscal year there is not another ton transported we will not be harmed, because now there are 70,000 tons of coal at Manila, all put there by virtue of the last appropriation act. That is more than sufficient to supply the needs of the Department until the end of the fiscal year and leave a greater surplus than there was at the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman assume that the Navy Department will go on accumulating coal unnecessarily without justification? If they will not go on, then what is the object of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Oh, the gentleman will not get us off from the main question. The question is not whether you are going to accumulate unnecessarily, but whether you will pay an unnecessary rate of transportation on that coal. I brought in the amount of coal to show that you could not be harmed even if during the remainder of this fiscal year there was not another ton of coal transported from this country to Manila. But why does the gentleman presume that no more coal will be transported under this limitation?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am getting information from the gentleman myself.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The information given to the Committee on Appropriations is that under the present conditions shipowners expect the United States to pay the entire cost of ships going to Manila and returning to this country when they carry our coal. Instances have been cited in which these owners would carry a cargo of coal to Manila and coming back bring part of a cargo that was shipped from this country to Honolulu at a less rate than the Government paid for the trip from this country to Manila. And, again, none of the coal from Ohio, as I understand, goes to the Philippines. If I recollect the printed testimony correctly, this coal is shipped from Baltimore, Lamberts Point, and Newport News, all on Chesapeake Bay. It is Pocahontas coal, Georges Creek coal, and New River coal. It seems to me that no industry of this country can be harmed by this amendment, but the public Treasury will save a vast amount of money by being relieved from the necessity of paying any price that the American shipowner may exorbitantly charge for the transportation of coal. They charge $7.50 a ton, when it used to be transported for less than $5 a ton.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it would be the part of wisdom for this committee to adopt this amendment. The restriction in the amendment, in my judgment, would prohibit the Department from purchasing coal. I am inclined to think that undue interest has been manifested here in regard to the difference charged for transporting coal. I remember distinctly the testimony of the admiral, and I remember his reply when the question was asked him if the foreign shipowners were not induced at this time to offer a lower rate of freight than they had previously charged from the fact that they felt that they could not get any of the coal to transport. He stated that perhaps that might be the reason. The difference in the cost of transporting this coal in our American bottoms is not so great as has been stated here upon the floor of the House, or as can be inferred by the statement of the admiral, when you compare it with the charges made previous to the passage of this act.

The report of Admiral Manney on the charges for transporting coal from the Atlantic coast to Manila, which was all transported in foreign bottoms from 1889 to 1904, was that it averaged $6.53 a ton.

Mr. FITZGERALD. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman there?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Admiral Manney stated to the subcommittee——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I am quoting his report of those years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He stated that the highest price paid in foreign bottoms was $4.87½ a ton and the average price was $4.50 a ton.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from New York wants to be entirely fair?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. TAWNEY. He stated that the price was made at a time when there was a rate war between the steamship companies.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And he said $4.87½ was the highest price ever paid, whether there was a rate war or not.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Permit me to read from the testimony before the committee. Colonel Edwards states as follows——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Colonel Edwards has nothing to do with the transporting of coal.

Mr. LITTAUER. No; but he also comments on freight rates, and he gives us the following:

> When I first went into the office I found that the freight rates were $12.50 a ton. That was in 1899. I had to ship out the printing plant, which cost something over $200,000 at that rate. I found the combination there then. That combination was finally broken and we got a rate of $10, then $8.20, then $7, and then near $6. Then the rate war came on, which was very destructive; no money was made at all, and the rate went down to $4.50. That was, if I recollect aright, in 1903. Since then they have gone back to what they call a living rate, $7.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not on the transportation of coal for the Navy at all. It is the transportation of other freight for the Philippine government.

Mr. LITTAUER. Permit me to continue.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I want to state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] that I understand full well the testimony of Admiral Manney, both before the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that he made the statement that foreign bottoms were offering to carry coal at $4.50 and that American bottoms at $7.50, but that he replied to a question that perhaps the foreign owners were making these offers because they did not believe they would get a cargo of coal, and it seems to me that the figures for that Bureau for the years preceding the passage of this law show conclusively that that inference could be honestly obtained; and if this amendment is carried with those facts as they are, it would be entirely prohibitive, and the Navy Department would find it impossible to transport coal from the Atlantic to the port of Manila. While there may be at the present time, as stated, 70,000 tons of coal there now, yet that is an infinitesimal amount in case of emergency and our battle ships demanding a recoaling. It would be very unwise for us to permit them to get below thirty or forty thousand tons or even fifty thousand tons, and I hope that the facts stated here in the report that the lowest average for the years previous to the passage of this law was $6.53 will be sufficient, and that the committee will not favor this amendment.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Certainly.

Mr. RIXEY. Did not Admiral Manney also state that for the years before this law went into effect the highest price he paid for the transportation of coal to Manila was $4.50 a ton?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I think not. I did not so understand him.

Mr. RIXEY. I think he did; and did he not also state that the passage of this law had not given them any more ships in which to transport coal, and that there were fewer American ships to-day willing to take this coal to Manila than there were when it was passed?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I did not so understand it, in that broad sense, but I did understand it that he was unable, as he desired to transport the coal, to find them as conveniently at some times in the season as at others.

Mr. RIXEY. Did he not also state that there was practically no competition by the owners of these ships in the carrying of this coal?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. He said, on the other hand, that so far as he was able to judge there was no combination.

Mr. RIXEY. Did he not state that the price was exactly the same that was offered in each case?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. He said practically the same, but that he had given the matter some thought and he said positively in regard to the matter that there was no combination.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman let me read just what he said about the price?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend by adding the following: "Provided, That no rates or amounts shall be paid for carrying coal in American ships in excess of one and one-fifth times what it would cost to make the same shipment in a foreign vessel."

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that is in effect new legislation. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. DE ARMOND. But I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not care. The gentleman cares to be heard and he ought to be heard. It is not material to the gentleman whether the Chair hears him or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The provision is clearly legislative, and so clearly so that the Chair did not care to waste the time in listening to the gentleman discussing it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The Chair has his privilege of ruling upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, and the Chair has the privilege of hearing it discussed. If the gentleman desires to discuss it, the Chair will hear him, but it was so perfectly clear that the Chair thought the gentleman would hardly care to discuss the matter.

Mr. DE ARMOND. But the gentleman at that time had assured the Chair that he did care to discuss the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Very good; the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, ordinarily one does not care much to discuss a question after it has been decided, so far as the decision itself goes. I take this amendment to be a limitation upon this appropriation. The provision of the law, as I understand, is for the carrying of coal in American ships. The provision in this bill is for an appropriation for deficiencies for that kind of service. It has been developed in discussion here, and admitted, that coal can be carried in foreign ships for, say, in round numbers, two-thirds of the cost of carrying it in American ships. The excess, it seems to me, is an unreasonable one. A limitation that came in some other way, I suppose, would hardly, in the judgment of the Chair, be regarded as a change of law. I think it would be proper, as a matter of law, after providing that conveyance shall be made in American ships, to provide that the payment should not be greater than the average charge for conveyance in foreign vessels. This provision, however, is that it shall not be more than one-fifth greater; that there may be given an absolute bonus of not more than 20 per cent, or one-fifth, to the American shipowner over the foreigner. If that be not a limitation of an appropriation, I do not know what it is. If it were to say that there should be given $1,000 less or $100 less or 1 cent less in certain contingencies, I think it would be a limitation. Stating it by percentage, it seems to me the same thing, but whether it is to be disposed of by the ruling of the Chairman upon the point of order or by the vote of the committee on partisan lines, as other propositions have been disposed of here to-day, is of comparatively slight consequence. The result is practically the same—that you provide for carrying coal only in American ships, that you know that you are paying more for carrying it than you would have to pay otherwise, that you refuse to put in a provision that you shall not pay more than one-fifty more, and desire to have it stand so you may pay one-half more, or twice as much, or four times as much, if the American shipowner chooses to exact it; that is what will be decided. That is all I care to say, either about the merits of the amendment or upon the point of order. Let it all be disposed of as you please. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS.

Freight, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts: All freight charges pertaining to the Navy Department and its bureaus, except the transportation of coal for the Bureau of Equipment, $75,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

On page 20, line 9, insert:

"Bureau of Steam Engineering—Steam machinery: For completion, repairing, and preservation of machinery and boilers of naval vessels, including cost of new boilers; distilling, refrigerating, and auxiliary machinery; preservation of and small repairs to machinery and boilers in vessels in ordinary, receiving, and training vessels; repair and care of machinery of yard tugs and launches, $500,000."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota reserves the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, that is the language of the appropriation bill for the present fiscal year, and there was an estimate for deficiency of $1,000,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you put it in as a deficiency or as an original appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is estimated for as a deficiency.

Mr. TAWNEY. I say, does your amendment specify that it is to supply a deficiency?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No more than these other amendments do. It follows the same form for the different bureaus as provided in here.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York inform the Chair upon what page of the sundry civil bill of last year this provision can be found?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chair will find that in the naval appropriation bill, on page 22.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman send to the Chair the provision?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation for this year under this heading was $3,950,000, Bureau of Steam Engineering.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has that.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that this is offered as a supplemental appropriation for the conduct of work which was provided for in the act of March 3, 1905, and therefore it is in order as an appropriation to be expended during the year ending June 30, 1906. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a very brief statement regarding this amendment. Last year the estimate for the Bureau of Steam Engineering was $4,095,000. The Committee on Naval Affairs allowed $3,905,000. The work of the Bureau has been such that by the 1st of January, 1906, $2,300,000 had been utilized in keeping in repair machinery of vessels in commission. For the second half of the fiscal year—that is, from January 1, 1906, to June 30, 1906—the Bureau has left $1,600,000. The Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering submitted, through the Secretary of the Navy and Secretary of the Treasury, an estimate for a deficiency of $1,000,000. He stated to the committee in response to an inquiry that the amount of money that he had at his disposal if apportioned monthly would not be sufficient to do the work the Bureau must necessarily do. The importance of providing additional money for this Bureau is due to this fact: A number of vessels are sent into the navy-yards to be overhauled; the Bureau of Steam Engineering, the Bureau of Construction, and Bureau of Equipment, and the other bureaus all work hand in hand; if, because of lack of funds, one bureau must stop its work, it necessarily makes necessary the stoppage of the work in other bureaus.

There have been sent into the different yards several vessels upon which large repairs have been ordered, and unless additional money is provided work will necessarily stop to a great extent in the navy-yards. The fact that this Bureau is spending a great sum of money is due to the fact that there are in commission a great number of naval vessels. The horsepower of the machinery of these naval vessels has, during the past few years—from 1901–1905—increased threefold, while the appropriations have increased but 1.5 times. These vessels, if put in perfect condition and laid up in ordinary, would then be ready for an emergency at a moment's notice. But under the policy of keeping them in active service, of making these vessels participate in maneuvers, so that the officers and crew will be in a highly efficient state, the wear and tear upon the machinery and the necessary repairs are greatly increased.

Mr. Chairman, I have inserted here but one-half of the amount the Bureau has estimated as necessary. This is one of the Bureaus that has been criticised for not having followed the apportionment under the law of last year; but it is utterly impossible to anticipate the repairs that will be necessary to machinery unless it is definitely determined just how much service the different vessels will be called upon to perform. For these reasons I hope, in order to keep the work of this Bureau going, and not to cripple it and the different naval stations of the country, that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the committee gave very careful consideration to this item. In the first place, the Bureau has now $1,600,000 available. They went to the Committee on Naval Affairs, or they came to Congress, before the beginning of the present fiscal year, and they estimated that they would require for this fiscal year $4,095,000. Congress gave them within $190,000 of what they asked, and now they come here with a deficiency of $1,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are several reasons why the committee declined to allow this deficiency estimate. In the first place, if the apportionment made by the Secretary of the Navy at the beginning of this fiscal year had been adhered to, there would have been no deficiency. But the necessity for the waiver, as stated by the Secretary, was that it was necessary to maintain the machinery of the vessels in proper shape.

I read yesterday morning in the Washington Post, under the heading of "Army and Navy News," a statement which I think more accurately explains the reason for the deficiency than that given by the Secretary. It is as follows:

The battle ship Indiana will be ready for service, it is expected, by February 3, and will immediately join the fleet in the West Indies. The crew of the Massachusetts, which recently went out of commission, will be transferred to the Indiana. The Massachusetts will be repaired at a cost approximating $750,000, and in all probability will be laid up at the New York Navy-Yard for two years or more.

The Chief of the Bureau told us, when he was before the committee, that they had recently overhauled a number of large naval vessels. I stated at the opening of this debate that in our investigation we found that we have to-day two systems of naval construction, one authorized by Congress and the other authorized by the Secretary of the Navy under the word "overhauling." I do not know, and we could not get the information in time, as to what the cost of overhauling a naval vessel is, but, according to this item, the cost of overhauling the Massa- chusetts, or reconstructing her, will be $750,000, equaling almost the aggregated expenditure authorized by Congress for the building of four naval vessels in the Forty-seventh Congress, and almost twice as much as the cost of any one of the vessels authorized between 1873 and 1876; twice as much as the cost of the Alert, which is an iron ship, or the Ranger, built between 1873 and 1876.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that if we are to go on appropriating money for the maintenance and repairs of machinery, and then allow the Navy Department to divert that appropriation for the purpose of reconstructing the Navy, there is no telling to what extent the deficiencies will hereafter occur in the naval appropriation bills, or to what extent it will be necessary for us to make appropriations for carrying out the orders of the Secretary of the Navy in respect to the reconstruction of naval vessels. This deficiency arises not because of any extraordinary emergency, but it arises because the apportionment was waived in order that the reconstruction of vessels might be carried on under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy. If we are going to have two kinds of naval construction in the United States, then let both be under the jurisdiction and under the authority of Congress. I asked the Chief of this Bureau when before the committee if he did not think the Navy Department or the Secretary, when he desired to reconstruct, or, as he called it, "overhaul," naval vessels to come to Congress with his estimates as to what the cost would be, when that cost involves an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and secure the approval or authority of Congress before making that expenditure. The only objection, he said, was that it might cause delay in the rebuilding or reconstruction of the battle ships.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman know that under the law no repairs can be made upon any vessel in the Navy that exceeds 10 per cent of its appraised cost?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no such law; there is no law on the subject. There was an old law that applied to wooden vessels, but there is no law to-day that applies to a naval ship in respect to the amount that may be expended for that purpose; and for that reason this deficiency was omitted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have sufficient time to answer the question that I would like to ask him.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What is the purpose of this amendment?

Mr. TAWNEY. To supply a deficiency of a million dollars for the maintenance and repair of machinery.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether this item has been submitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a deficiency. The Committee on Naval Affairs in the last appropriation allowed the Navy Department $190,000 less than they estimated.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now there is an estimated deficiency of $1,000,000. This $500,000 proposed by the gentleman from New York is to make up that part of the deficiency, which deficiency the Committee on Appropriations declined to allow for the reasons I have given.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. We allowed them what we thought they should have, and it was not intended that a deficiency should be created. If there is one, there should be some way to prevent a repetition of it. Last year we appropriated more than $100,000,000 for the maintenance of the naval establishment, and it was not intended that there should be a single deficiency.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am very glad to have that statement from a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Chairman, I understand this deficiency appropriation is asked for by reason of the fact that repairs were necessary, not only to the particular ship mentioned by the gentleman from Minnesota, but others, which necessitated the use of a portion of the appropriation intended for new ships. Now, it ought to be understood that there are several thousand men at work in the New York Navy-Yard, and a large portion of these men will have to be laid off if appropriations are not made so as to keep them employed, and this expert labor will be disseminated all over this country and perhaps in foreign countries. The Navy Department is opposed to that. Now, there may possibly be something in what the gentleman from Minnesota has said about the battle ship Massachusetts; but if he had taken his information from the Navy Department instead of out of some paper that he happened to read this morning, I should perhaps pay more attention to it. It seems to me now that this additional appropriation asked for in the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] ought to be allowed for the benefit of the Navy Department, in order to keep that force at work there, so that this work may be done and that the battle ships under construction may proceed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Just one word in reply. I want to say that this is one of two cases where the Committee on Appropriations felt that there had been a clear evasion of the law enacted by the last Congress to prevent deficiencies. That was one of the reasons why this deficiency item was not included in this bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Was it not a violation of the law?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; not technically; but it was a violation of the spirit of the law.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last word. I think it is well for this committee to understand where we are on the subject of navy-yards. The estimates sent to the Navy Department from our navy-yards, covering the next fiscal year, amount to how much, do you suppose? They amount to more than $42,000,000. They have, of course, been reduced. We have been struggling in the Committee on Naval Affairs for two weeks to get away from the reduced estimates. I want to repeat, so that you will understand—$42,000,000; and if navy-yard officials are "given their heads," they will absorb the American Treasury. Now is the time to halt. Of course a class of naval officials want thousands of men in the navy-yards. It is a part of their programme to fill the different yards with employees and to provide for their continuous employment. Now, I understand we made an appropriation for new machinery to be used on a certain ship, and it has been used for some other purpose not designated in the last naval appropriation bill.

I sincerely hope that the committee will not for one instant make the appropriation provided for in the amendment and thereby clearly defeat the aim which our committee is now making. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 18; noes 67.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

To enable the Director of the Geological Survey to complete the investigation of the useful values contained in the black sands of the United States, under the conditions prescribed in the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1905, $25,000, of which not exceeding $2,000 may be expended for rent of rooms.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I should like to inquire the circumstances with reference to this appropriation, and how it becomes necessary.

Mr. LITTAUER. In the sundry civil act of last year $25,000 was appropriated to make an investigation of useful mineral values contained in the black sands about placer mines. The investigation was carried on at the Portland exhibition, much of the machinery being furnished by manufacturers free. There were many tons of samples brought there, also at the expense of those who sent them. It was found that very valuable minerals were contained in these sands, particularly platinum, which at the present time is exceedingly scarce and in great demand, because of its use in electrical development. Now, this experiment has gone on to the point of determining that there were great values not only of platinum but other minerals in these sands, but a method of extracting them had been found. Many samples were yet to be examined, the examination of which would enable the expert in charge to further perfect the method of extracting the ores, and that these experiments could be completed by an additional appropriation of $25,000.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So this makes $50,000 in all appropriated for that purpose?

Mr. LITTAUER. It makes in all $50,000 for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the necessary transportation of Indian goods, provisions, and other supplies for the Indian service for the fiscal year 1905, $10,000.

To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation "Transportation of Indian supplies," fiscal year 1905, $9,693.86.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill for an explanation of these two paragraphs.

Mr. LITTAUER. In reference to the paragraph—

For the necessary transportation of Indian goods, provisions, and other supplies for the Indian service for the fiscal year 1905, $10,000—

The supplies had been purchased and transported to the Indian agencies, where they were distributed. A deficiency arose in the year 1905, a deficiency of $10,000, to pay for such transportation.

Mr. MACON. In the next paragraph is an appropriation to pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the transportation of Indian supplies, $9,693.

Mr. LITTAUER. The latter paragraph contains amounts that have already been audited, while the former is for deficiencies yet to be provided for.

Mr. MACON. One is a finding and the other is an appropriation direct?

Mr. LITTAUER. The other is an appropriation to meet a deficiency which the Department advises us is actually necessary. The second item is an appropriation to pay accounts that have been audited.

Mr. MACON. One is an estimate and the other is an account already adjudicated?

Mr. LITTAUER. One is an estimate and the other is an account audited.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the care and support of insane persons in the Indian Territory until the close of the fiscal year 1906, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That the Indian citizens in said Territory shall be cared for at the asylum in Canton, Lincoln County, S. Dak., $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, line 16, after the word "necessary," insert: "For asylum for insane Indians, Canton, S. Dak., 1906: For the equipment and maintenance of the asylum, for incidental and other necessary expenses for its proper conduct and management, including pay of employees and necessary expenses of transporting insane Indians to and from said asylum, $3,500."

Mr. LITTAUER. I will state that this is an item that came to us after the bill had been reported to the House, and it seems to be perfectly proper.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

To reimburse the appropriation "Miscellaneous expenditures" of the Department of Justice for the fiscal year 1906, the amount expended for a portrait of ex-Attorney-General P. C. Knox, $2,615.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that this appropriation is not authorized by existing law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I can not appreciate how a point of order can be raised at this time. This is a reimbursement for an appropriation for miscellaneous expenditure—expenditures that have already been made—and is a character of expenditure that has been made in the past constantly under the authorization for this miscellaneous expenditure.

Mr. JAMES. It appears to me that the argument of the gentleman from New York is an admission that this appropriation is not authorized by existing law. The only reason he gives why it should be allowed is that at other times such expenditures have been made. If a wrong has been committed in former times by ordering pictures painted of distinguished men, that is no reason why it ought to be committed again. If this gentleman wants his picture hung on frescoed walls, he is able to pay for it.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman from Kentucky must know that the picture has been hung and that the amount has been paid, and that this is to reimburse the miscellaneous account.

Mr. JAMES. It ought not to be hung at the expense of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether, in his judgment, this does not conflict with the provision in last year's appropriation bill prohibiting the expenditure of any money by the head of any Department?

Mr. LITTAUER. It was waived by the Attorney-General and his waiver sent to Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. What provision of law permits the Attorney-General to waive a law of Congress?

Mr. LITTAUER. The law itself contains such a provision.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that, in my judgment, the only question that pertains to this matter is whether it is an expenditure authorized by law—whether it is such an item as can be properly construed to be a contingent expense incident to that particular Bureau under the language of the appropriation.

Mr. LITTAUER. And further, Mr. Chairman, the law states that this appropriation was for miscellaneous expenditures, enumerating various articles, current books of reference, periodicals "and other necessaries directly ordered by the Attorney-General."

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is a necessary expenditure?

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman claim that this is a necessity?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; I do not claim that.

Mr. JAMES. I would suggest that if anybody wants to see the picture of the ex-Attorney-General they can see the real article at the other end of the Capitol. If he should pass away, they could put a statue in the hall of fame to commemorate him. I do not think, therefore, the picture of ex-Attorney-General Knox is a necessity now; I think the point of order should be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous expenditures, including telegraphing, fuel, lights, foreign postage, labor, repairs of buildings, care of grounds, books of reference, periodicals, and other necessaries, directly ordered by the Attorney-General, for the fiscal year 1905, $413.45.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill about these periodicals and their necessity and why they are considered necessary in the conduct of the Attorney-General's Office.

Mr. LITTAUER. This is a deficiency occuring in the fiscal year of 1905 of $413.45. It is exactly in the terms of the law. Periodicals are provided for under the law.

Mr. MACON. As necessary articles?

Mr. LITTAUER. Not as necessary. The law, with which we have no concern here, simply reads "periodicals and other necessaries."

Mr. MACON. Does that mean that the Department has a right to purchase any periodical it wants for private reading?

Mr. LITTAUER. It gives them the right to purchase periodicals. That law was passed for the fiscal year of 1905, and a deficiency exists thereunder.

Mr. MACON. Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for me to give any relief by moving to strike out the word "periodicals."

Mr. LITTAUER. The expenditure has already been incurred.

Mr. MACON. As I say, we can give no relief by striking it out; but it strikes me as being a rank evil to give under the law the Departments the right to purchase periodicals or any old thing they want.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will not the gentleman reserve his motion until the legislative bill is up again, when he can offer an amendment?

Mr. MACON. I do not make any motion; I was making a few remarks in the time I had under the five-minute rule, and only moved to strike out the last word. I am not making any motion; but it strikes me as being a crying evil to allow such an extravagance as periodicals purchased by the heads of Departments to amuse themselves with when they have nothing else to do, and incidentally at any time, and therefore I simply called the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact, not that I expect to right it at this time, but that the committee might correct the wrong in its next bill. I am simple enough to think that it is wrong to tolerate such a proceeding. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 12320) and had come to no resolution thereon.

APPOINTMENT OF JANITORS, ETC., TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania presents a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[House resolution No. 182, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Mr. CASSEL, from the Committee on Accounts, reported, in lieu of H. Res. No. 18, H. Res. No. 109, H. Res. No. 79, H. Res. No. 107, H. Res. No. 101, H. Res. No. 74, H. Res. No. 111, H. Res. No. 148, H. Res. No. 95, H. Res. No. 71, H. Res. No. 83, H. Res. No. 84, H. Res. No. 113, H. Res. No. 19, H. Res. No. 147, H. Res. No. 21, H. Res. No. 78, H. Res. No. 40, H. Res. No. 26, H. Res. No. 36, H. Res. No. 156, H. Res. No. 44, H. Res. No. 58, H. Res. No. 150, and H. Res. No. 127.

Resolved, That the chairmen of the Committees on (first) Education, (second) Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River,

(third) Mines and Mining, (fourth) Patents, (fifth) Industrial Arts and Expositions, (sixth) Coinage, Weights, and Measures, (seventh) Railways and Canals, (eighth) Militia, (ninth) Expenditures on Public Buildings, (tenth) Expenditures in the Department of Justice, (eleventh) Expenditures in the Navy Department, (twelfth) Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, and (thirteenth) Pacific Railroads, be, and they are hereby, authorized to appoint a janitor to each of said committees to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, whose compensation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $60 per month, and said janitors, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, shall also have the care of the rooms of the following-named committees and offices and shall perform all of the duties required of messengers, namely:

First. Revision of the Laws, and Labor.

Second. Reform of the Civil Service, and the room of the index clerks.

Third. Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, and Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Fourth. Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and Mileage.

Fifth. Manufactures.

Sixth. Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments.

Seventh. Private Land Claims, and Expenditures in the Post-Office Department.

Eighth. Census, and Ventilation and Acoustics.

Ninth. Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, and Immigration and Naturalization.

Tenth. Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

Eleventh. Lieutenants, and guard rooms of the Capitol police and the room formerly used by the Committee on Examination and Disposition of Documents.

Twelfth. Expenditures in the State Department and Expenditures in the War Department.

Thirteenth. Expenditures in the Interior Department.

The pay of such janitors shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of said chairman.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to appoint a janitor to perform service in the office of the file, journal, and printing clerks of the House, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $60 per month.

Resolved, That the chairmen of the following-named committees are hereby authorized to appoint clerks to such committees to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the usual per diem compensation of $6, which shall in each case equal in the aggregate the amount paid session clerks whose employment is provided for by law, namely, Census, Pacific Railroads, Private Land Claims, and Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress: Provided, That the pay of such clerks shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of said committees.

Resolved, That the chairmen of the following-named committees are hereby authorized to appoint assistant clerks to such committees to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the usual per diem compensation of $6, which shall in each case equal in the aggregate the amount paid session clerks whose employment is provided for by law, namely: District of Columbia, Enrolled Bills, Indian Affairs, and Pensions: Provided, That the pay of such clerks shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of said committees.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is hereby authorized to appoint a messenger to said committee, to serve during the present Congress, whose compensation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $60 per month from and after December 4, 1905.

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby authorized to employ Hugh Williams as a page in the press gallery of the House during the remainder of the present fiscal year, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $75 per month from and after December 4, 1905.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. Sarah M. Henshaw, daughter of Norton McGiffin, deceased, late a folder on the rolls of the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months' pay at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death, and a further sum, not exceeding $250, on account of the funeral expenses of said Norton McGiffin, said amounts to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Thomas W. Conway, brother of Joseph R. Conway, deceased, late a laborer in the Doorkeeper's department of the House, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death, and a further sum not exceeding $250 on account of the funeral expenses of said Thomas W. Conway, said amounts to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the compensation of the assistant clerk to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, whose employment was authorized by a resolution adopted by the House December 19, 1905, is hereby authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby authorized and directed to employ a lady attendant in the ladies' reception room, Statuary Hall, to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $60 per month.

[House Report No. 526, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred sundry resolutions providing for the employment of janitors, clerks, assistant clerks, etc., to certain committees of the House, having had the same under consideration, recommend the adoption by the House of the following resolutions in lieu thereof, viz:

"1. Resolved, That the chairmen of the Committees on (1) Education, (2) Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, (3) Mines and Mining, (4) Patents, (5) Industrial Arts and Expositions, (6) Coinage, Weights, and Measures, (7) Railways and Canals, (8) Militia, (9) Expenditures on Public Buildings, (10) Expenditures in the Department of Justice, (11) Expenditures in the Navy Department, (12) Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, and (13) Pacific Railroads be, and they are hereby, authorized to appoint a janitor to each of said committees to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, whose compensation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $60 dollars per month; and said janitors, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, shall also have the care of the rooms of the following-named committees and offices and shall perform all of the duties required of messengers, namely:

"(1) Revision of the Laws, and Labor;

"(2) Reform in the Civil Service, and the room of the index clerks;

"(3) Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, and Irrigation of Arid Lands;

"(4) Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and Mileage;

"(5) Manufactures;

"(6) Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments;

"(7) Private Land Claims, and Expenditures in the Post-Office Department;

"(8) Census, and Ventilation and Acoustics;

"(9) Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, and Immigration and Naturalization;

"(10) Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress;

"(11) Lieutenants' and guard rooms of the Capitol police, and the room formerly used by the Committee on the Disposition of Documents;

"(12) Expenditures in the State Department and Expenditures in the War Department;

"(13) Expenditures in the Interior Department.

"The pay of such janitors shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of said chairmen.

"2. Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to appoint a janitor to perform service in the office of the file, journal, and printing clerks of the House, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $60 per month.

"3. Resolved, That the chairmen of the following-named committees are hereby authorized to appoint clerks to such committees, to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the usual per diem compensation of $6, which shall in each case equal in the aggregate the amount paid session clerks whose employment is provided for by law, namely, Census, Pacific Railroads, Private Land Claims, and Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress: Provided, That the pay of such clerks shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of said committees.

"4. Resolved, That the chairmen of the following-named committees are hereby authorized to appoint assistant clerks to such committee, to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the usual per diem compensation of $6, which shall in each case equal in the aggregate the amount paid session clerks whose employment is provided for by law, namely: District of Columbia, Enrolled Bills, Indian Affairs, and Pensions: Provided, That the pay of such clerks shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of said committees.

"5. Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is hereby authorized to appoint a messenger to said committee, to serve during the present Congress, whose compensation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $60 per month from and after December 4, 1905.

"6. Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby authorized to employ Hugh Williams as a page in the press gallery of the House during the remainder of the present fiscal year, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $75 per month from and after December 4, 1905.

"7. Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. Sarah M. Henshaw, daughter of Norton McGiffin, deceased, late a folder on the rolls of the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months' pay, at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death, and a further sum not exceeding $250 on account of the funeral expenses of said Norton McGiffin, said amounts to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

"8. Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Thomas W. Conway, brother of Joseph R. Conway, deceased, late a laborer in the Doorkeeper's department of the House, a sum equal to six months' salary, at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death, and a further sum not exceeding $250 on account of the funeral expenses of said Thomas W. Conway, said amounts to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

"9. Resolved, That the compensation of the assistant clerk to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, whose employment was authorized by a resolution adopted by the House December 19, 1905, is hereby authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

"10. Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby authorized and directed to employ a lady attendant in the ladies' reception room, Statuary Hall, to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $60 per month."

Taking up these resolutions in their order, your committee begs leave to state:

First. That we find 36 rooms, including committee rooms and certain offices connected with the House of Representatives, without janitor service, namely: Alcoholic Liquor Traffic; Census; Coinage, Weights, and Measures; Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments; Education; Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress; Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture; Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor; Expenditures in the Department of Justice; Expenditures in the Interior Department; Expenditures in the Navy Department; Expenditures in the Post-Office Department; Expenditures in the State Department; Expenditures in the Treasury Department; Expenditures in the War Department; Expenditures on Public Buildings; office of the file, journal, and printing clerks; Immigration and Naturalization; index clerk's office; Industrial Arts and Expositions; Irrigation of Arid Lands; Labor; Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River; Manufactures; Mileage; Militia; Mines and Mining; Pacific Railroads; Patents; Private Land Claims; Railways and Canals; Reform in the Civil Service; Revision of the Laws; Ventilation and Acoustics; lieutenants and guards' room, and the room formerly used by the Committee on the Disposition of Documents.

The resolution reported herewith provides for the care of these thirty-six rooms and offices by the employment of fourteen janitors, who are to be appointed by the chairmen of certain committees named in the resolution, whose compensation shall be $60 per month during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress. The pay of these janitors is to begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which is to be ascertained and evidenced by the chairmen authorized to appoint them. This resolution, if adopted, will provide every committee room and every office in the House wing of the Capitol with janitor service that are not now so provided. And by assigning each janitor to two or more rooms, and by requiring that they shall also perform messenger service, we believe to be a proper, an equitable, and at the same time an economical arrangement. Janitors appointed under this resolution will have the care of the groups of committees indicated by the numbers, and they will be directly responsible to the chairmen appointing them for the proper discharge of their duties in all of the rooms to which assigned, and inefficiency, inattention to duty, or misconduct on the part of any janitor should be reported to the chairman of the first-named committee of the group of committees to which such janitor may belong.

In the last Congress (Fifty-eighth) nine janitors in addition to the regular force were provided for by resolutions reported from the Committee on Accounts and adopted by the House. They were assigned as follows:

Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress, and Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, one janitor; Expenditures in the Department of Justice, Expenditures in the Interior Department, and Expenditures in the Navy Department, one janitor; Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, Expenditures in the State Department and Expenditures in the Treasury Department, one janitor; Expenditures in the War Department, Expenditures on Public Buildings, Mileage, and Ventilation and Acoustics, one janitor; Education, Enrolled Bills, and Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, the House document room, and the library of the House.

Of the foregoing the House document room, the library of the House, and the Committee on Enrolled Bills are the only rooms now provided with janitors, the two first mentioned having been provided for by law and the latter by resolution of the House of December 19, 1905.

It will be seen that nine janitors in the last Congress had the care of eighteen committee rooms and offices. They were employed for the entire Congress, including the recess between sessions, and their compensation, at $60 per month each, aggregated $7,896. We now propose to employ fourteen janitors at the same rate of pay, but to confine their employment to the sessions of the present Congress. This will be an apparent increase of five janitors, but an actual increase of only two chargeable to the contingent fund of the House, for the reason that three committees, namely, Labor, Industrial Arts and Expositions, and Revision of the Laws, are taken care of in our resolution which are entitled, according to custom, to janitors by law, but provision for same having been omitted from the current legislative appropriation act, we have included them in the plan now recommended. But while there is a total increase of five janitors over the number provided in the last Congress the number of rooms to be cared for is increased from eighteen in the Fifty-eighth Congress to thirty-six in the present Congress—just double the number of rooms. And while nine janitors in the last Congress cost $7,896, it is now proposed that fourteen janitors shall cost, it is estimated, $5,880 for the present session, carrying it until the end of the fiscal year, $300 during the recess, and $2,520 for the second session, making the total for this Congress $8,700, an increase of only $904 over the last Congress for double the amount of service.

Considerations of health, cleanliness, the comfort of Members, the dispatch of the public business, and the fact that some Members of the House have themselves been paying for janitor service induced your committee to recommend this general provision for janitors, leaving nothing of this kind to be done during the remainder of this Congress, and in so doing we have had due regard for economy as well as for the other purposes to be subserved.

SUMMARY.

Number of janitors recommended, 14.
Number of rooms provided for, 36.
Number of janitors, Fifty-eighth Congress, by resolution, 9.
Number of rooms, Fifty-eighth Congress, 18.
Apparent increase of janitors, 5.
Actual increase chargeable to contingent fund, 2.
Increased number of rooms to be cared for, 18.
Amount paid for 9 janitors, Fifty-eighth Congress, $7,896.
Amount estimated for 14 janitors, Fifty-ninth Congress, $8,700.
Estimated increase by proposed resolutions, $904.

Estimates are based on employment during first session Fifty-ninth Congress, until June 30, 1906, whereas if Congress sooner adjourns the expenditure will be less.

We recommend that resolutions numbered 18, 109, 79, 107, 101, 156, 74, 111, and 148 lie on the table.

Second. The janitor authorized by this resolution for the office of the file, journal, and printing clerks of the House, an overcrowded room wherein a great volume of important public business is transacted, is undoubtedly necessary. This janitor is included in the foregoing general statement relative to janitors.

We recommend that House resolution No. 95 lie on the table.

Third. This resolution authorizes the appointment of clerks during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress to the Committees on Census, Pacific Railroads, Private Land Claims, and Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress, at the usual per diem compensation of $6, and in order to equalize their salaries with those of session clerks to committees whose employment is authorized by law we provide that they shall be paid an amount which, in the aggregate, shall equal that paid such session clerks. It is also provided that the pay of these clerks shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties.

The current legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act provides for eleven session clerks to committees, which clerks have already been assigned by resolution to that many committees, leaving certain other committees unprovided for, among them the four committees above named, three of which, namely, Census, Pacific Railroads, and Private Land Claims, were provided for in the Fifty-eighth Congress by resolution. It is now proposed to add the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress to this class. This committee has had referred to it in the present session a number of important bills pertaining to its jurisdiction, which the chairman of that committee states will receive consideration, and the services of a clerk will therefore be necessary. For these reasons we recommend this additional clerk.

During the time these clerks are on the roll the chairmen of the committees named will be denied, under the law, the usual allowance for personal clerk hire, so that, while their total compensation will be $7,087 for the entire Congress from the contingent fund of the House, a saving of $4,000 will be effected in personal clerk-hire allowances, which will revert to the Treasury from the appropriation for clerks to Members. Thus the actual net expenditure for these four clerks will be $3,087.

SUMMARY.

Number of clerks recommended, 4.
Number of these authorized in Fifty-eighth Congress, 3.
Increase, 1.
Estimated expenditure from contingent fund, $7,087.
Amount of clerk-hire allowance deducted, $4,000.
Net expenditure from Treasury, $3,087.

Fourth. This resolution provides assistant clerks during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress for the Committees on the District of Columbia, Enrolled Bills, Indian Affairs, and Pensions. This is an increase of one assistant clerk—to the Committee on Pensions—and this we are convinced is necessary for the proper and expeditious transaction of the business of that committee, for the reasons set forth in the following letter from its chairman, viz:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1906.

DEAR SIR: I am very anxious to have your committee take favorable action on resolution No. 40, which I introduced for the appointment of a session clerk to facilitate the work of this committee.

When I became chairman of this committee, in the Fifty-fourth Congress, it had 661 bills referred to it for consideration. Since that time the work has steadily increased, and particularly since the Spanish-American war. At the last session we had 1,519 bills, and at this session, up to this time, we are 34 per cent ahead of last Congress at the same stage of the term, and if the present rate of increase should continue during the term we will have at least 2,000 bills to consider.

The handling of this large volume of business requires close and painstaking work, involving much time and care. The miscellaneous character of the work coming before the committee embraces all of the ramifications of the pension system, and the papers to be considered are voluminous and complicated. Much of the time of the limited clerical help attached to the committee is taken up in answering questions and furnishing blanks and information for the use of Members. The hours of labor have heretofore and will doubtless hereafter be greatly increased, often extending into the night, and the additional help provided for in the resolution is necessary, not only to the committee, but in aid of the individual Members who come to the committee for help concerning their pension matters generally.

Yours, truly,

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER, Chairman.

Hon. H. B. CASSEL,
Chairman Committee on Accounts, Washington, D. C.

The expenditure for the four assistant clerks recommended will be $7,087 for both sessions of the present Congress, from which there will be no reduction on account of personal clerk-hire allowance, for the reason that the chairmen of the committees named are granted personal clerk-hire allowance by law.

SUMMARY.

Number of assistant clerks recommended, 4.
Number of these authorized in Fifty-eighth Congress, 3.
Increase, 1.
Estimated expenditure for entire Fifty-ninth Congress, $7,087.
Increase over Fifty-eighth Congress, $1,772.

We recommend that House resolutions numbered 71, 83, 84, 113, 19, 147, 21, 78, and 40, providing for clerks and assistant clerks, be laid on the table.

Fifth. This resolution authorizes the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to appoint a messenger to said committee at $60 per month. Such messenger was granted in the last Congress and is shown to be necessary in this Congress, and we therefore recommend the adoption of the resolution. The amount involved is $660.

We recommend that House resolution numbered 57 be laid on the table.

Sixth. This resolution authorizes the appointment of Hugh Williams as a page in the press gallery of the House. It has been customary to so name him and to pass a resolution providing for this position. Service of this kind has been shown to be necessary in the press gallery and it is recommended by the members of the press gallery committee. We therefore recommend the adoption of the resolution.

We also recommend that House resolutions numbered 26 and 36 be laid on the table.

Seventh. Authorizes payment out of the contingent fund of the House to Mrs. Sarah M. Henshaw, daughter of Norton McGiffin, late a folder, of a sum equal to six months of his salary and not exceeding $250 for funeral expenses. This resolution is in due form and is in accordance with the practice relative to payments on account of deceased employees.

Eighth. Same as No. 7, except that the proposed beneficiary is Thomas W. Conway, brother of Joseph R. Conway, late a laborer. The amount involved in this and in the preceding paragraph is $1,320, both men having received at the time of their death $720 per annum each.

We recommend that resolutions numbered 44, 58, and 150 be laid on the table.

Ninth. This resolution simply makes effective the resolution of the House adopted December 19, 1905, providing an assistant clerk to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, by authorizing payment out of the contingent fund of the House in accordance with the joint resolution approved January 17, 1906, relating to contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

Tenth. This resolution authorizes the Doorkeeper to appoint a lady attendant in the ladies' reception room, at a salary of $60 per month, during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress. A portion of Statuary Hall has been set off, by direction of the Speaker of the House, as a public reception room, from whence ladies may send in their cards to Members of the House. This room has been fitted up with the necessary appurtenances, and it is quite evident to your committee that a lady attendant there is not only proper, but necessary. We therefore favorably recommend the resolution, and that resolution numbered 127 be laid on the table. The amount involved is estimated to be $500.

For the further information of the House we would state that it is estimated that the resolutions adopted by the House December 19 and 20, 1905, will involve a total expenditure for the present session, carrying the session to the end of the fiscal year, of $4,440.50.

RECAPITULATION.

Salaries of 14 janitors	$8,700
Salaries of 4 clerks to committees	7,087
Salaries of 4 assistant clerks to committees	7,087
Salary, messenger to Committee on Judiciary	660
Salary, page, press gallery	515
Payments on account of deceased employees	1,310
Salary, attendant ladies' reception room	500
Total	25,859
Less amount of clerk hire reverting to Treasury	4,000
Net total	21,859

During the reading of the above,

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this thing that is being read now a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been paying very close attention to the reading, but presumably it is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is not, I desire to object and end it right now.

Mr. CASSEL. It is a privileged report, Mr. Speaker; it carries an appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I serve notice on the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that he may as well withdraw it, for if he does not I shall fight it, roll call and all.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the report.

Mr. CASSEL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the Committee on Accounts has prepared this resolution and report with a very great deal of care; that we have had before us the various resolutions which have been introduced into the House and after careful consideration have prepared the report; that we have had prepared a detailed statement of all of these appointments, and I now ask that this report of the committee be printed in the RECORD so that each Member of the House can have a full copy of it in the morning, and that the matter be left open for further discussion at that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the report accompanying the resolution be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all right. I did not propose to have any such resolution as that come up at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman asks that the matter go over to be called up again?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes; as unfinished business or as a privileged resolution.

There was no objection.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a request coming from the Committee on Claims and also the Committee on War Claims, taking from the Committee on Claims certain Executive documents touching findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of the French spoliation claims, and asking that the reference be changed from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on War Claims. The effect of this, if done, would be to change the jurisdiction of the respective committees as that jurisdiction has been heretofore exercised. If the change should be made, about which the Chair does not intimate any opinion as to the propriety thereof, the Chair will feel justified in the future, if not incidentally authorized when similar communications come, to refer the same to the Committee on War Claims instead of to the Committee on Claims. With the explanation given, is there objection to the request?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask who it is that presents this request?

The SPEAKER. It comes with the indorsement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER], the chairman of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation giving the reason for this. Some of us know that the jurisdiction of these various committees is a matter of very great moment sometimes, and I would like to have some explanation of the necessity for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas not being present, with the permission of the House the matter will go over until another day.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted as follows:

To Mr. SMITH of Maryland to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Charles Chaille Long, Fifty-eighth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

To Mr. CALDERHEAD to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Eliza M. Burke, Fifty-eighth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

To Mr. MOON of Tennessee to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Asa Faulkner, O. B. Spurlock, and others, Forty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

BILLINGS LAND DISTRICT.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8994) to provide for a land district in Yellowstone, Carbon, and Rosebud counties, in the State of Montana, to be known as the "Billings land district," which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all that portion of the State of Montana included within the present boundaries of Yellowstone and Carbon counties and all that portion of the ceded and unceded part of the Crow Indian Reservation lying within the limits of Rosebud County, is hereby constituted a new land district, and that the land office for said district shall be located at Billings, in said Yellowstone County.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 7, after the word "county," insert the following: "west of the Big Horn River."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand it, the general law provides for the arrangement of land districts by the President of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the right to object before any discussion is had.

Mr. PAYNE. I have reserved the right to object.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the President has full authority to create a land district or change a land district. Why the necessity of this special act?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. The President does not have the right to create a new land district. He does have the right when the business of old districts has become very small to consolidate old districts or move the land office. In this case the Crow Reservation is to be opened this coming August, and the Department has asked that this land office be created at Billings right at the head of the Crow Indian Reservation.

Mr. PAYNE. And it is shown there is a necessity for this office?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Absolutely. There is a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and it is unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the colloquy which ensued between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Montana. Still reserving the right to object, I want to know the necessity for this piece of legislation.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. As I have just explained, the great Crow Indian Reservation is to be opened this coming August under the act passed two years ago. At the present time there is no land office within a hundred and fifty miles on one side of the reservation and probably a hundred and thirty or a hundred and forty on the other. This is the creation of a new land office asked for by the Department and unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands to establish a new land office on the edge of the Crow Indian Reservation soon to be opened for settlement.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. How many acres are there in the Crow Reservation?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. About 1,300,000.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DIXON of Montana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2159. An act authorizing the Jasper and Eastern Railway Company, its successors and assigns, to construct and operate a railroad bridge across the Sabine River, in the States of Texas and Louisiana; and

S. 321. An act to provide for the extension of time within which homestead settlers may establish their residence upon certain lands which were heretofore a part of the Uinta Indian Reservation, within the counties of Uinta and Wasatch, in the State of Utah.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ANDRUS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three days on account of death in the family.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet on Wednesday, January 24, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for enlarging the Army Building at New York City—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for pay of the Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Supervising Architect submitting an estimate of appropriation for a heating, power, and light plant for the new custom-house building at San Francisco—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for post exchange and amusement hall, general hospital, Presidio, San Francisco, Cal.—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of deficiency appropriation for pay of Military Academy—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation for completion of revenue steamer for Albemarle and Pimlico sounds, North Carolina—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for Mountain Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of the Red River of the North from Fargo to the international boundary line—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SLAYDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11543) to correct the military record of Benjamin F. Graham, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 497); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLAY. I present certain memorials from citizens of my State, relative to a railroad-rate bill. They are very brief, and the memorialists request that the memorials be printed in the RECORD. I ask that the body of the memorials be printed in the RECORD, and that they be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia presents certain memorials, and asks that they be printed in the RECORD, excepting the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The memorials are as follows:

MACON TRADES AND LABOR LEAGUE, No. 5,
Macon, Ga., January 18, 1906.

Whereas bills are pending in Congress and Senate of the United States to empower the Interstate Commerce Commission with authority to fix freight rates on all railroads in the United States; and

Whereas rate making means rate reduction, which will have to be met by the railroad management, reducing expenses, and as they can not reduce the interest on their bonds, price of steel rails, cross-ties, bridge iron, etc., then the reduction must come off of the wages of their employees, thus taking it from the wage-earning class and giving it to the rich shippers: Now, be it

Resolved by the Macon Trades and Labor League in regular session, That we are opposed to this class legislation and pray our Senators and Congressmen to vote against it, believing it to be for the best interest of a large majority of the people.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senators Bacon and Clay, and Congressman Bartlett, with a request that they read them before their respective bodies, and we spread them on our record for future reference.

We certify that we represent and voice the wishes of 3,500 wage-earners.

Atlanta Labor League, composed of the following crafts: Machinists, blacksmiths, boiler makers, carpenters, carmen, engineers, conductors, clerks, firemen, flagmen, trainmen, coppersmiths, tinsmiths, laborers.

Whereas we are opposed to any rebates or favoritism in freight rates, we are equally opposed to any law which would empower any Government commission with arbitrary power to make rates, believing it to be dangerous to our form of government; and

Whereas we feel confident that said commission would reduce rates, compelling the railroads to reduce expenses, which would first come off of the wages of the employees: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Atlanta Labor League in regular session on January 10, 1906, That we are opposed to any bill becoming a law which would clothe seven men with such gigantic power.

Be it further resolved, That the secretary mail Hon. A. O. BACON and A. S. CLAY and Hon. L. F. LIVINGSTON each a copy of these resolutions, with a request that they have them read before their respective bodies, and a copy to be sent to the chairman of the committee of the Senate and House of Representatives on Interstate Commerce, and the same to be spread on our record for further reference.

Unanimously passed January 10, 1906, at a regular meeting held at Atlanta, Ga.

These resolutions represent 1,350 employees.

SAVANNAH TRADES AND LABOR LEAGUE, No. 6,
Savannah, Ga., January 20, 1906.

Whereas several bills are now pending in the United States Senate and House of Representatives to take out of the hands of the railroads the right to make freight rates and delegate said right to Interstate Commerce Commission, appointed by the President of the United States; and

Whereas we consider this a dangerous class of legislation which would undermine the shrine of American liberty and result in chaos, where now tranquillity exists, between employer and employee, said Commissioners would justify this additional power by reducing rates and the railroads would be compelled to reduce expenses, as they can not control price of steel rails, cross-ties, bridge iron, etc. The reduction would fall upon a million and a half of employees who are not protected in any of the recent bills pending before Congress: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Savannah Trades and Labor League, No. 6, in regular session, That we are opposed to this class of legislation, and pray our Senators and Representatives to work and vote against it, believing it to be to the best interest of the majority of people in this country.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent Senators BACON and CLAY and Congressman LESTER, with the request that they be read in each of their respective Houses, and a copy be sent the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and be spread on our records for future reference.

We certify that we represent and voice the wishes of 7,500 citizens and wage-earners of this district.

Resolutions unanimously adopted. Regular session, Savannah, January 20, 1906.

Mr. PENROSE presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pittsburg, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the Indian Territory when admitted to statehood; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a memorial of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pittsburg, Pa., remonstrating against the repeal of the present anticanteen law; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON WATERS AT NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. PLATT. I introduce a joint resolution which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. R. 24) authorizing the President of the United States to invite the Government of Great Britain to join in the formation of an international commission to examine and report upon the diminution in the volume of water passing over the falls of Niagara was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to invite the Government of Great Britain to join in the formation of an international commission, to be composed of four members from each country, whose duty it shall be, from time to time, to report upon the conditions and uses of the waters adjacent to the boundary line between the United States and Canada, and particularly the waters of the Niagara River above the falls of Niagara, and also upon the effect upon the shores of these waters by reason of their diversion from their natural flow, and further to report upon the necessary measures to regulate such diversions, having in view the protection of the falls of Niagara against such diminution of the flow of water over said falls as to impair their natural beauties.

The President is authorized to appoint the United States members of such commission, and said commission is authorized to employ such surveyors, experts, and other persons as it may deem needful in the performance of the duties hereby imposed.

The sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the portion of the expenses of said commission chargeable to the United States, including the compensation of the commissioners representing the United States and of surveyors, experts, and other necessary services.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 8994. An act to provide for a land district in Yellowstone, Carbon, and Rosebud counties, in the State of Montana, to be known as the Billings land district, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BATTLEFIELD MONUMENTS IN CUBA.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 87) to authorize the use of the transport Sumner to convey members of the Santiago Battlefield Commission and others to Cuba and return was read the first time by its title.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to employ the United States Army transport Sumner to convey, from New York to Santiago de Cuba and return, the members of the Santiago Battlefield Commission and the representatives of the President and of the State and War Departments, to enable them to attend the ceremonies to be held at the dedication of battle monuments at El Caney, Fort San Juan, San Juan Ridge, and San Juan de Mayaras Hill, in the immediate vicinity of Santiago de Cuba: Provided, That the total additional expense shall not exceed $10,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BLACKBURN was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MALLORY was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. GORMAN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BLACKBURN was assigned to the Committee on the District of Columbia and Mr. MALLORY was assigned to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Calendar is in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 88 be laid before the Senate for consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

MOROCCAN CONFERENCE AND RELATIONS WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am entirely conscious of the great difficulty involved in following the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] in the discussion of the important subject upon which he spoke to the Senate yesterday. I quite realize that, after the manner in which he dealt with those questions, anything that I may say is in great danger of being an anticlimax. Where the Senator from Wisconsin has reaped there is very little left for anyone else to glean. But I was referred to so frequently in the course of the debate in connection with the attitude of the Administration in regard to Santo Domingo, that it seemed to me I owed it to myself to say a few words at least upon that subject.

Moreover, Mr. President, I think both questions discussed by the Senator from Wisconsin are of such importance that even reiteration, which is always valuable in bringing important matters home to the public mind, will not be wholly misplaced. I can not hope to throw much new light upon the subject. Neither can I hope to change personal or partisan prejudice or alter a stolid determination not to look at the facts as they are. But even the most imperfect presentation of the case may help to make it clearer than it now seems to be in certain quarters.

I do not myself think it is a wise practice to discuss matters affecting foreign relations in open Senate. I believe most thoroughly in the wisdom of the practice of the Senate, which has always been to treat such questions in executive session. It is very well, and perhaps within certain limits desirable, that in the House of Representatives, as in the House of Commons in England, subjects relating to our foreign relations should be at times publicly discussed. But the Senate occupies toward our relations with other countries a wholly different attitude. We are a part of the executive government in the administration of foreign affairs, and that which would be an impropriety on the part of the Executive, or on the part of our ambassadors or our Cabinet officers, would be an impropriety on our part, because what is said here carries necessarily greater weight than what is said anywhere else.

But, Mr. President, it is useless to attempt to keep such subjects within the executive session or in secret session unless all Senators are themselves agreed as to the wisdom of doing so. No matter what the practice of the Senate may be, no matter what action it may take on any specific case, it is always perfectly possible for any Senator, by a general resolution, to disregard custom or order and discuss the subject in public if he chooses to do so.

I think too often also we abandon the morning hour, which should be reserved for legislative business, to the discussion of foreign affairs and of general resolutions which rise but little beyond the discussions of a moot court.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, the subject, or rather the two subjects, upon which I desire to speak are here. They have been brought before the Senate and their discussion can not be avoided. I shall endeavor, however, in what I have to say not to travel out of the public record or to discuss anything which is more properly to be considered behind closed doors.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], in his interesting speech a day or two ago, devoted all his eloquence and earnestness to the preservation of the principles laid down by Washington in his Farewell Address. If salvation were needed by the principles laid down by Washington, I have no doubt that the Senator from Georgia would then and there have saved them. But I do not myself apprehend that the principles laid down by Washington in the Farewell Address are in the slightest danger.

The conference at Algeciras in regard to Moroccan affairs is the incident which has excited the alarm of the Senator from Georgia, and yet it is the most natural thing in the world. As was pointed out by the Senator from Wisconsin yesterday, this is by no means the first time that, in common with other nations, we have dealt with the affairs of Morocco. We made a treaty with Morocco herself in 1787. In 1865 we made another treaty with Morocco in company with the principal powers of Europe. That treaty was for the erection of a light-house at Cape Spartel and for its neutralization and protection. In 1880 we made another treaty with Morocco in which all the European powers joined, not strictly commercial, but for the protection of foreigners and defining the rights of foreigners in Morocco, and that treaty was ratified by the Senate in 1882. Our representative at the conference was General Fairchild, who was appointed to perform that duty by the President.

When the present troubles began in Morocco we were invited, as a matter of course, as one of the signatories of both these prior conventions, to take part in the new conference. It would have been impossible for Morocco to do otherwise. We have commercial interests there, and in that semicivilized State we have found it necessary to join with other countries in suitable provisions for the protection of our citizens. Now, when questions have arisen which may alter very much the commercial relations of Morocco, it becomes not only our right, but our duty, to see that those interests are still protected.

Senators will remember that last June the German Emperor made a protest against the agreement of the French and English Governments in regard to Morocco, basing his objections upon the maintenance of the open door, which he considered to be in danger. If I am correctly informed and the press is correct about it, he invited us to join in that protest, and we declined. Then subsequently came this invitation to the conference, and this conference was the method by which the danger of war at that period, if it existed, was avoided. The President, of course, appointed delegates. They are now there, and I have no doubt that their presence will be of very great value. We have no right to assume that their instructions are in any way in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution or with the traditions of the Government.

It is not necessary for me again to go over the ground which the Senator from Wisconsin traversed yesterday. No one, I think, can doubt the absolute power of the President to initiate and carry on all negotiations; and after a treaty has been returned to him with the ratification of the Senate to withhold it from ratification if he sees fit so to do. There is no doubt that the Senate can by resolution advise the President to enter upon a negotiation, or advise the President to refrain from a negotiation; but those resolutions have no binding force whatsoever, and the action of the Senate becomes operative and actually effective only when a treaty is actually submitted to it. We have no possible right to break suddenly into the middle of a negotiation and demand from the President what instructions he has given to his representative. That part of treaty making is no concern of ours. As was suggested to me by a distinguished Senator the other day, it would be just as if the President were to send word to us that, if not incompatible with the public interest, he would be obliged if we would send him our secret journals.

He is entitled under the Constitution to come here and join with us in the consideration of treaties or other executive business. As a matter of fact, that was never done but by Washington, and it has been abandoned ever since, although the right remains recognized by our rule to-day. Yet I think we should be disposed to resent it if a request of that sort was made to us by the President of the United States.

We are rightly jealous in the maintenance of our prerogatives. I use the word as the Senator from Wisconsin correctly used it yesterday, for prerogative is not necessarily a royal prerogative. Meaning merely a special privilege or inherent right it may appertain to anything or to anybody. In looking up the word in order to confirm my own memory I found a quotation from Burke in which he referred to the prerogative of a freeman, and we speak of the prerogative of Parliament, or the prerogative of a court, or the prerogatives of the Senate.

Mr. President, I repeat we are justly jealous of our own prerogatives and our own rights, but we can not maintain them or insist upon them unless we are equally observant of the prerogatives and the rights of the other departments of the Government. It is a mere invasion of the powers and rights of the President if we are to plunge in at a stage of the negotiation where we have no business whatever and demand from him the instructions which he has given to his properly appointed representatives. When the treaty made by those representatives comes before us then is the time, and not before, in which we can properly ask for information in regard to all which led up to it.

Mr. President, the idea that there is something very strange and very novel in our joining with other nations in the settlement by treaty of matters affecting commercial questions, or, indeed, other questions, is a wholly mistaken one. The famous warning against entangling alliances which is embodied in the Farewell Address, as everyone is aware, grew out of the troubles which Washington endured on account of our alliance with France. The party of opposition, the "Anti-Federalist party," as it was then called, the party of Thomas Jefferson, had opposed with the utmost bitterness the neutrality policy of Washington and his Cabinet. They had urged that we should interpret that treaty to mean that we should go to war with the enemies of France whether France was making an offensive or a defensive war. Out of that situation grew Washington's wise and judicious warning; but he was altogether too sensible and too practical a man to suppose that because we were not to engage in alliances which might involve us in the wars of Europe, with which we had no concern, therefore we were never to engage in any agreements with any nations of Europe, no matter how beneficial they might be to the world at large or to ourselves.

I have here a rough list of some of the treaties in which we have joined with other countries. In 1863 we joined with the countries of Europe in a general treaty as to tariff dues on the river Scheldt. In 1866 we joined with France, Great Britain, and the Netherlands in a tariff treaty with Japan. In 1899 we made a joint treaty with Germany and Great Britain for the settlement of the Samoan question. We joined in international conventions in 1864 relating to wounded in time of war; again in 1868 on the same subject; in 1875 on weights and measures; in 1883 as to industrial property; in 1884 as to submarine cables; in 1886 as to the exchange of official documents; in 1890 as to customs tariffs; in 1890 as to the African slave trade; in 1899 in a general treaty for the exclusion of spirituous liquors from Africa; in 1901 we were one of the signers of the protocol with China as to the Boxer trouble, and in 1899 we joined in all of The Hague conventions.

Mr. President, if the principle were carried out that we were never to join with any other countries, that entangling alliances meant anything of that kind, most of the great and beneficial things which have been achieved by international agreement would have become impossible to us.

We have joined, as I have shown, with other countries in regard to Morocco before. We are there now properly, entirely properly, in regard to commercial interests, if nothing else. I am prepared to go further than that, Mr. President. If the influence of the United States can be exerted at that conference, if its good offices can be used toward the preservation of the world's peace, I sincerely hope they may be.

It is the policy of the United States to be at peace; but, more than that, the policy and interest of the United States alike demand the peace of the world, and it is not to be supposed for a moment that we are never to exert our great moral influence or to use our good offices for the maintenance of the world's peace.

The moral influence of the United States was exerted last summer, through the President of the United States, in such a way as to bring to an end one of the bloodiest wars of modern times. I believe there are persons who are disposed to criticise the President even for doing that. When those little criticisms have sunk into silence and been forgotten the peace between Russia and Japan, which was due to the President of the United States, representing, as he did, the moral influence of this country, will stand out as a noble and historic achievement and one of the great events of modern times.

Mr. President, in entangling alliances, of course, no man wants to engage this country; we have no concern with the wars of Europe; no one for a moment would think of engaging us in a position where we might be involved in them, the President least of all, for on the President, whoever he may be, falls the most dire responsibility in case of war; but, Mr. President, the phrase "entangling alliances" does not mean that we should not unite with other nations on commercial questions, on the settlement of the rights of commerce, as to the rights of our citizens in other countries, or in the promotion of those great and beneficent objects which are embodied in international conventions.

Mr. President, I do not care to go further into the question of our relations to the conference at Algeciras. The case is really too plain to require more than a mere statement. I for one am very glad that we are represented there. I have no doubt that what is there done and the presence of our envoys there will make for the advancement of our commerce in Morocco and will also make for what is infinitely more important, the peace of the world.

I desire now to say a further word in regard to Santo Domingo, which has been the principal subject of discussion in the debate which has sprung up here in regard to various resolutions. That treaty, Mr. President, involves a very large question of policy, and has been used to open a very extensive discussion upon the Monroe doctrine. I was quoted the other day as having said that it was a "new departure," that it was a "new policy." The reference was to a speech which I made last summer—an entirely extemporaneous speech—in which I used neither the phrase "new departure" nor "new policy." I spoke of the treaty as "the beginning of a great policy," and in using the word "beginning" I spoke loosely and inaccurately. I should have said that it was the continuance of a great policy; and I am prepared, and desire briefly, to show why I think it is also a sound and necessary policy. In the first place, I do not think that we can escape from our responsibilities, and I think our responsibilities in those islands are not created for us merely by the Monroe doctrine, but by the very fact of our neighborhood to those islands.

As the Monroe doctrine has been brought into the case, I want to say a word in regard to it. It was very ably and very eloquently discussed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], and upon what he then said I wish myself to say something. The Monroe doctrine is very familiar and almost as much misunderstood I sometimes think. We constantly refer to the famous passage in which President Monroe said:

> With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere; but with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

But there was another principle laid down in another part of the message, where Mr. Monroe said:

> That the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

The exclusion of Europe from meddling with the political conditions of the American States was advanced by Canning before it was advanced in this country, and, as is well known, he invited us to join with him in that protest; but it is not quite so well known that after Mr. Monroe's message Mr. Canning, in more than one dispatch, absolutely repudiated the doctrine on account of the clause relating to colonization. When he repudiated it, he refused to go on with us as against the claims of Russia on the northwest coast.

Up to that time England and the United States had protested jointly and proposed to act jointly against the enormous claims put forward by Russia in the ukase of 1820. But Canning broke from us at that time on account of that clause relating to colonization. The clause relating to colonization is the really vital one, for it covers the acquisition of territory; and it is that which I desire to discuss briefly, with some reference to what the Senator from Maryland said in regard to it.

I am quite ready to admit that the temporary possession of a custom-house does not in the least necessarily involve the Monroe doctrine. So far as enforcing contractual obligations by force of arms may go, that is something about which there is a great variety of opinions, and the practice has been as various as the opinions. But in regard to the Monroe doctrine, the Senator from Maryland cited three cases which he suggested settled our interpretation of it. I do not think his citations were altogether fortunate for his purpose, and yet I think he covered the only cases where the Monroe doctrine has been brought into controversy, except, perhaps, the first Venezuelan case.

The Senator from Maryland referred first to the action of France in regard to Mexico, and quoted from a letter of Mr. Seward as showing that we did not regard that at the outset, at least, as an infringement of the Monroe doctrine. He drew a large deduction from mere silence, and the inference is contradicted by subsequent events. Mr. President, it is to be remembered that when England, France, and Spain conjointly determined to send a fleet over here for the purpose of taking coercive measures in regard to Mexico they stated in the convention which they made:

ART. II. The high contracting parties engage not to seek for themselves, in the employment of the coercive measures contemplated by the present convention, any acquisition of territory nor any special advantage, and not to exercise in the internal affairs of Mexico any influence of a nature to prejudice the right of the Mexican nation to choose and to constitute freely the form of its government.

In other words, they explicitly in their convention included all the prohibitions of the Monroe doctrine. England and Spain found that France intended to go much further, and they withdrew from the agreement. Then it became evident that it was the purpose of France to overthrow the Mexican Government and establish on its ruins an imperial government with a member of the House of Austria as the head.

There was never any doubt then, I think, in the minds of anyone here that it was an infringement of the Monroe doctrine. Certainly if we had not been engaged in our civil war, we should have acted with immense promptitude; but, as it was, the House of Representatives passed a resolution, without a dissenting voice, in 1864, declaring that:

The Congress of the United States are unwilling by silence to have the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators of the deplorable events now transpiring in the Republic of Mexico, and that they therefore think fit to declare that it does not accord with the policy of the United States to acknowledge any monarchical government erected on the ruins of any republican government in America under the auspices of any European power.

The very day after the surrender of Lee at Appomattox a dispatch went from Washington, through our London legation, to our French legation notifying the Government of France that the United States expected the immediate withdrawal of her forces; and we moved an army down to the Mexican border to support our demand.

There was no doubt whatever as to what the world thought of it. Sir Edward Creasy, a distinguished English historian, says in his book, the First Platform of International law:

The United States (occupied by their own civil war which was then raging) did not actually send troops to oppose the French in Mexico, but they steadily refused to recognize Maximillian or any other government except a republican government in Mexico; and the language of their statesmen exhibited the fullest development of the Monroe doctrine.

I have always believed, and I still think, Mr. President, that our action after the civil war was a thorough and powerful vindication of the Monroe doctrine, which had been seriously invaded and disregarded by the French.

Now, as to the Corinto incident, which is referred to by the Senator from Maryland. That was brought about, not by a contractual obligation of any kind or by the failure to pay bonds, but by an affront offered to the British consul. An indemnity for that indignity was demanded by the British Government. They sent a fleet to Corinto; they took temporary possession, and they compelled Nicaragua and the surrounding States to pay this indemnity of £75,000. I thought at the time that the attitude of our Government was weak and spiritless. I thought, despite the fact that there was no attempt to overturn the Government of Nicaragua and no attempt to take permanent possession there, that nevertheless our Government ought to have interfered and that the incident was one of evil example.

I desire further merely to show that very far from establishing a precedent as to our interpretation of the Monroe doctrine, the Corinto incident was thought at the time by American statesmen to have been treated by our Government in a very dangerous manner and in a way we should not have permitted.

I quote the words of one of the ablest international lawyers who ever sat in this Chamber—a man of profound learning, who had given the study of years to this question. I refer to the late Senator Davis, of Minnesota. In his little book On International Law he says:

The events at Corinto, in Nicaragua, are recent and well known. For a trifling offense to her dignity, which was either wholly denied or greatly palliated by the statement of Nicaragua, which was committed during a time of revolutionary excitement, Great Britain fined that weak and poverty-stricken Republic $75,000, and demanded immediate payment in gold. It was in vain that Nicaragua pleaded for arbitration. It was in vain that she asked for time to pay the money, arbitration having been refused. In default of immediate payment, the British ships of war appear in Corinto. British troops take possession of the town. The British flag floats over Nicaraguan soil, and this armed occupation continues, until, it is said, Costa Rica, San Salvador, Guatemala, the little brothers of that family of republics, contribute what pocket money they have to get the burly, blustering intruder out of the house. Of course, the pretext was that England has the right to make war upon Nicaragua, and that her seizure of a portion of its territory, to hold it and govern it until the fine is paid, is not an infraction of the Monroe doctrine. But, all things considered, the nature of the grievance, the brutality of the reprisal, the refusal to arbitrate or to give time to pay, the actual seizure of territory, the position of Great Britain on the Atlantic coast as to the Nicaragua Canal, her position at Corinto, on the Pacific, as to the same work, the great investments of American capital in that enterprise, the successful continuation of which greatly depends upon political stability in Nicaragua; considering also what Great Britain is doing in Venezuela at the mouth of the Orinoco, looking north to the canal, her possessions in Jamaica and the Windward Islands completely commanding it, it is my opinion that the seizure of Corinto was "dangerous to our peace and safety," and should have been prevented.

I quote that passage merely to show that one of the leading statesmen of the United States at that time not only questioned the attitude of the Administration, but absolutely denied its soundness.

Later, in his second Administration, however, Mr. Cleveland, by his action in the Venezuela question, entirely redeemed the weakness which he had shown in regard to Corinto. The Venezuelan case was an attempt to take additional territory. I do not think anyone will now dispute that the English course then was an infringement of the Monroe doctrine. I very cordially supported the attitude of Mr. Cleveland at that time, and I firmly believe now in the wisdom of his action. It did more to vindicate the Monroe doctrine than anything that had been done up to that period, with the single exception of the expulsion of the French from Mexico. It had a profound effect on Europe, and greatly improved his own relations with Great Britain.

The last case cited by the Senator from Maryland was the recent trouble with Venezuela, when we, without interference, allowed Germany and Italy and Great Britain to go to Venezuela, bombard her towns, and compel her to enter into an arbitration.

Mr. President, it was perfectly understood before those powers moved a ship that no territory was to be taken, and later, if I am not mistaken, assurances were given that no troops were to be landed and no custom-houses taken. It is too early as yet for all the correspondence in relation to that incident to be placed before the world, but I think it will be found that in that incident, as in the case of the invasion of Mexico, the policy of our Government was firmly against permitting even temporary occupations. These cases, far from showing that we have confined our enforcement of the Monroe doctrine to attempts to subvert American governments or seize territory, exactly prove the reverse.

Temporary occupations, so wisely resisted and frowned upon by our Government, are very dangerous things, for there is no limitation on the word "temporary." Egypt began with a temporary occupation by the British and the French, and to-day it is wholly in the control of England. And France has now disavowed by the treaty that relates to Morocco all further connection with Egypt.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator whether Great Britain did not, at the very time she entered upon the occupation, disavow any intention to permanently stay there?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Not only was it to be temporary, but she disavowed that it would be permanent.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be a very great misfortune to this country to have foreign powers taking possession, temporarily or otherwise, for any purpose, of the custom-houses or other portions of the territory of any of the American republics. I think when that is done it creates a perilous situation, which we should all deplore. It is far wiser to avoid situations of that kind than to wait for them and try to cure them after they have arisen.

I freely admit that the Monroe doctrine in nowise interferes, and ought not to interfere in any way, with the right of any nation to seek redress for any infringement of the rights of its citizens, anything in the nature of a national affront, or anything which derogates from its honor. Of course, the Monroe doctrine touches no question of that kind. In the same way, I am perfectly willing to admit that the Monroe doctrine interferes in no way with the collection of debts. But, Mr. President, that is not the point.

The Monroe doctrine is not a question of international law. As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] said, it is a declaration of national policy. It is coextensive with the American Navy—not one bit bigger than that. If you have no navy, all the fine talk about the power of the United States and 80,000,000 people will not amount to anything as against the greed of foreign nations. The Monroe doctrine is a vital and effective doctrine just so long as the United States stands behind it with an effective and powerful navy; and the question that we are dealing with in Santo Domingo to-day is not a question of how far the Monroe doctrine goes or where it stops, but is a question simply and solely of the facts and conditions now existing in that unfortunate island.

Look at those three islands as they lie there by the coast of the United States. One of them, Porto Rico, has passed into our hands. Another, Cuba, is under our suzerainty or protectorate. She is limited by us as to her foreign relations; she is limited by us as to her power to borrow money. We made her make those limitations a part of her constitution. The result is that Cuba to-day is the most successful of all the South American Republics which border on the Caribbean Sea, with the exception of Mexico. She has been prosperous; she has been peaceful; there has been no suggestion of foreign interference, and it is simply because we took with her the position we now occupy.

Our policy in regard to Porto Rico and our action in regard to Cuba are not matters of chance. They have come about by necessity. Not only are these islands near our coast, but we are going to build the Panama Canal. We have begun that great work. Its protection and its defense are of enormous importance to the people of the United States, as well as to the commerce of the world, and every portion of the Caribbean Sea is essential to the safety of the canal. We can not possibly allow the canal and the approaches to it to be commanded by any other power, and we have taken naval stations in Cuba for no other reason than its protection.

Between the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, within 90 miles of Porto Rico, where our flag floats, lies the island of Santo Domingo. It is in a condition of chaos. It is buried in debt. It has had a revolution every year at every annual election practically for the last forty years. It is no credit to us or to civilization that such a condition should exist in one of the most fertile and beautiful islands on the face of the earth.

Now, we have been brought face to face with this situation, and I am not summoning up any ghosts or any bogies or anything of that kind. The financial condition of Santo Domingo had reached such a point that foreign nations, representing their bondholders, were determined to get some of the money back. At the time when these negotiations began, at the very time when Colonel Colton went down there by the appointment of Morales and took over the custom-houses, there was an Italian man-of-war lying in the harbor ready to take possession, and intending to take possession, of those custom-houses in case some one like Colonel Colton, representing order and decency, was not put in control of those custom-houses by the Dominican Government.

I think, Mr. President, that in order to avoid the complications growing out of the taking of custom-houses by a foreign government it is infinitely better to take possession of them and administer them ourselves. I do not like this alternative, but I like the present condition still less, and I much prefer doing what it is now proposed that we should do than waiting until some foreign government steps in there. Then we should find ourselves in complications with the foreign power, and some of the very people who are now denouncing the President for interfering in Santo Domingo would be rending the air with shrill cries and demanding to know why he did not enforce the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. President, the policy embodied in this treaty is the peaceable, the sensible, the intelligent way to deal with this question. I admit it is a disagreeable thing to do. I admit it is not a thing that we naturally would like to do. That is not the question. The point is whether it is not a better process of dealing with a question which we can not avoid than to leave it alone feebly and helplessly until other nations undertake to settle it for themselves. I for one have never had the slightest doubt in regard to the wisdom of this policy.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator a question, with his permission, not for the purpose of argument, but that I may correctly understand the proposition; and if the Senator will accept the interrogatory in that spirit, I should like to submit it.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator states with force the influences which these neighboring islands, and I suppose he would also include countries upon the Caribbean Sea, or rather the bordering islands and lands on the Caribbean Sea, have necessarily upon our interest in the Panama Canal. The question I desire to ask the Senator is whether the logic of his proposition extends to other islands and bordering countries on the Caribbean Sea, and whether in that case the Senator goes further and means that in every case where a Central American or South American country bordering on the Caribbean Sea or one of the islands should become insolvent and on account thereof be threatened with violence for the collection of debts by some European power, a like obligation would necessarily, whether we desired it or not, rest upon the United States; and if not an obligation, whether the interest of the United States would require similar action in such a case?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the island of Santo Domingo and the adjoining Republic of Haiti, of course, are exceptional in their condition, as they are in their geographical situation. I trust no such condition as that of Santo Domingo will arise in any of the states bordering upon the Caribbean Sea. I certainly hope that nothing of that sort will happen. But if a question should arise which would involve the taking possession, permanently or temporarily—and by "temporarily" I do not mean overnight, but taking possession for administration for a time—of any of these strategic and important points along the Caribbean Sea, I do not think we as the builders and owners of the canal ought to permit it, and I think we ought to take proper steps to stop it if such a thing should occur.

I do not think either that we could afford to see the transfer of islands now held by small and friendly European powers, nonmilitary powers, to great military powers. I do not think we could permit the establishment of great places of arms by any military nation in the Caribbean Sea. I do not think we could afford, in our own interest and in the interest of the canal, to permit those ports and harbors bordering on that sea to be taken possession of.

Mr. BACON. I am very much interested in the statement of the Senator, and he will pardon me for making my question a little more explicit, in order that I may understand him correctly. Does he go to the extent which I will now suggest? I would ask the Senator whether I am to understand from his reply that he means that in case of the insolvency of any of the countries bordering upon the Caribbean Sea and the proposed action by any European power to take possession of custom-houses for the purpose of collecting debts the Senator would recognize that the logic of the proposition suggested by him would either require or make it to the interest of the United States Government to interpose, as it is now proposed to interpose in the case of Santo Domingo, by the United States itself undertaking to administer upon the revenues of that Government, their collection and disbursement, for the purpose of thus satisfying those European nations and for the settlement of the country's debts?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that is a very practical question—I do not mean the way of putting it, but the question itself—at this moment. I think we must deal with each of these cases as they arise. I see no governments around the Caribbean Sea, except the unfortunate Government on this island, which can not take charge of its debts. We may very likely be compelled to exercise some pressure in order to compel them to pay their debts, but I do not see any prospect of such a situation as the Senator suggests.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me? I think the situation exists now in the case of Venezuela, and we all know that the finances of Colombia are in a condition where that situation may speedily develop.

Mr. LODGE. When a foreign nation undertakes to take the ports, then will be the time for us to interfere. I do not think the only way of preventing a foreign nation from taking ports for the security of debts or for the payment of indemnity is what we desire to do in Santo Domingo. I think it can be prevented by proper representations and in the way of diplomatic negotiations, as it could be, I believe, and will be eventually in Venezuela; as it was done at the time when Germany and Italy and Great Britain came over and forced Venezuela into The Hague arbitration and into sufficient arrangements for the payment of her debts. But Santo Domingo is too feeble and too helpless to stand alone, and somebody must take possession of her custom-houses in order to relieve her people from the mass of fraudulent debts which are set up against them and to put them in a position where they shall have their debts in process of liquidation and shall be prevented from incurring more.

Under those circumstances I believe they would go on with a reasonable degree of peace and progress, and if we do not do the work somebody else will.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts, but I wish to suggest in this connection whether it is not true that if some government instead of ours does it, the just and admitted claims of American citizens would be extinguished by the preference of the claims of active governments under the award of The Hague tribunal in the Venezuela case? Would not the just and admitted claims of American citizens which would be placed in jeopardy be extinguished?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. We should be relegated to a secondary place in the payment of debts, and, moreover, we should have to join with other nations in that arrangement, if it were made. Instead of doing it ourselves on our own terms, we should join with other countries and have them do it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts objects to the occupation of the custom-houses in Santo Domingo by foreign military powers——

Mr. LODGE. By any foreign power.

Mr. NEWLANDS. By any foreign military power, because he fears that that temporary occupation may result in a permanent occupation.

Mr. LODGE. That is not the reason, at least it is not the only reason.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is that one reason?

Mr. LODGE. That is a reason, but I do not think it the only one in this case.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask him if that fear exists, whether there is not also fear that if we enter into the temporary occupation of these custom-houses for the purpose of collecting the debts due foreign nations, it will end in our drifting into permanent occupation, not simply of the custom-houses, but of the territory?

Mr. LODGE. One of my reasons for advocating this policy is that, in my judgment, it will have precisely the opposite effect. It has saved us from the annexation of Cuba, by the establishment of the partial control which we have over her debt and her foreign relations. One of the dangers I want to guard against is the reduction of Santo Domingo to such a condition that she will be forced into our hands. I do not want to take possession of those islands. I do not want to annex them to the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LODGE. Let me finish. I say I think the arrangement we made with Cuba, which was embodied in her constitution, by which we should have a voice in her foreign relations; by which we should have a voice in the manner in which her debt was incurred, is what prevented the annexation of the island. I think if we establish order in Santo Domingo by administering her custom-houses and settling her debts, we shall bring that island into a condition where annexation will be out of the question; but if we leave it in this welter of financial distress and political disorder, sooner or later we shall have to take her in self-defense, because we can not let anybody else take possession of the island; and I do not want to annex any more islands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to cite several instances where mere possessio pedis, such as we shall have under his proposed plan in Santo Domingo, has ripened into occupation and alleged title?

Mr. LODGE. I know that. I have already stated so myself. I have been over some of those cases in illustrating another part of the argument. I know what the Senator means.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I will not trespass upon the Senator's time.

Mr. LODGE. I think temporary occupation by a foreign power might easily ripen into something of that sort. I do not believe our taking possession will, because we tested it in the case of Cuba, and I think we have a well-settled policy which I think we are capable of following out.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me to cite him at least two instances in our own history in which innocent acts, temporary possession, accidental acts, have ripened into possession, and——

Mr. LODGE. Taking possession of custom-houses?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; to occupation of territory.

Mr. LODGE. Have ripened into annexation? I should like to hear them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. For instance, under our treaty with Colombia we had a mere possessio pedis on the Isthmus of Panama, involving a mere right of way——

Mr. LODGE. The Senator knows that is not a parallel case. It was settled by treaty.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I propose to show it is a parallel case.

Mr. LODGE. I wish the Senator would do so in his own time. It will take too much of mine.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will not trespass upon the Senator's time.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to a question, but this will take too much time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator asked me to cite several instances, but, of course, I do not wish to proceed without his consent.

Mr. LODGE. The point I wish to make is that I believe that this treaty is the surest way of avoiding annexation. I believe it is the surest way of preventing temporary foreign interference or occupation; and, Mr. President, except for the great mistake of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, we have sedulously guarded ourselves from permitting any foreign nation even to join us in anything relating to American affairs. One of the great and, to my mind, vital objections to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was that we invited the nations of Europe to join with us in neutralizing the canal. We do not want any assistance in managing American affairs.

Mr. President, if we take this ground, and we always have taken it, then the responsibility goes with it, and the responsibility is to see that these people, where they are helplessly unable to do it themselves, should be aided by us to pay their debts and maintain a reasonable degree of order. It was with that view that the treaty was made. The Senate adjourned without action upon the treaty. It neither ratified it nor did it reject it.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], in his usual picturesque way, described the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and myself as going to see the President in regard to it after the adjournment of the Senate. He might have included the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] as being present at the conversation to which, I suppose, he alludes, and he further described us as there surrendering our convictions and joining in with this Presidential policy which, under guise of a temporary arrangement, put the treaty in force.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is giving me credit for language which is not mine. It is the New York Sun's that I quoted, and I could not pretend to compete with the Sun in picturesque language.

Mr. LODGE. I was referring to the phrase "surrender at discretion."

Mr. TILLMAN. That, too, is in the Sun's article.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; then, the picturesque language is the New York Sun's. I am quite willing to admit that it is better language than the Senator's, if the Senator says so. I made no surrender, that I know of, of any kind. I was, personally, heartily in favor of this policy from the beginning as I am today. I think it is essential. I think it is absolutely sound and wise. I think it is a preventive of much greater and much worse evil.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator says he is in favor of this policy now and has been from the beginning. As I understand him, this policy involves the prevention of any European nation acquiring a foothold in the Caribbean. The Senator, of course, is already aware that Great Britain owns Jamaica——

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes, Mr. President.

Mr. TILLMAN. And has fortified it.

Mr. LODGE. It owned it at the time the Monroe doctrine was enunciated.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know. They already have great naval stations there, and either of their navies is larger than ours.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator does not follow current events. Great Britain has given up Santa Lucia as a place of arms and has specifically withdrawn.

Mr. TILLMAN. Bermuda is right north. She is close enough, and she has ships enough to give us trouble.

Mr. LODGE. Where does the Senator think the Bermudas are?

Mr. TILLMAN. They are a little off Florida—a little west.

Mr. LODGE. Has not the Senator mixed them up with the Bahamas?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not studied geography lately, but they are close enough, and in case of trouble——

Mr. LODGE. The Bermudas are far off in the Atlantic. They are not in the Caribbean at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. That may be. I am not trying to bring out the exact geographical location of these places, but the fact is that Great Britain already owns and controls the island of Jamaica, and her fleet is able to trouble us, I think, though I doubt whether there is any other fleet that could seriously disturb us on this side of the ocean. Her fleet controls the Caribbean Sea and is likely to control it; and is not this a bugaboo which the Senator is trying to bring out here to frighten the imagination of the American people when he says it is our business to seize upon and control the destinies of this little black republic and become responsible for its good order and thrift and responsibility as a debt payer?

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the Senator from South Carolina asking me a question, but I do hope that he will not put into my mouth words I never uttered or anything resembling them.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did ask a question.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] fortunately has a map here. I merely call attention to the fact that the Bermudas are off here [indicating] in the Atlantic Ocean, in the latitude of Charleston.

Mr. TILLMAN. I said they were off Florida, only a hundred or two miles away, north.

Mr. LODGE. I should think they are, roughly, about a thousand miles from Santo Domingo. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] says about fifteen hundred miles from Santo Domingo. They are, as I said, near the center of the Atlantic Ocean and north of the West Indies, and have nothing to do with them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Jamaica is one of the West Indies.

Mr. LODGE. I will not discuss what any nation might do in case of war. At least now there is no nation with a great place of arms there, and I do not wish to see a great nation establish itself there; and if there is one, I do not care for another.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator from South Carolina evidently did not intend to include Bermuda, for he mentioned several islands in the neighborhood under discussion. The Senator from Massachusetts, well aware of the absence of Bermuda from the neighborhood, mentioned the fact that England had broken up its great naval establishment at St. Lucia. But the nearest land to the mouth of the Panama Canal is Jamaica. It lies due north of it, and in Jamaica, at Kingston, is the largest entrepôt of naval stores and arms and the greatest dock and the greatest shipyard in the Western Hemisphere. That is certainly a fact that ought not to be excluded while we are showing what there is there.

Mr. LODGE. The great fleet, which I understood the Senator to say was at the island of St. Lucia, has certainly been withdrawn; at least it was so announced by the prime minister of England, just as they withdrew from Halifax.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will allow me, they also proposed to withdraw the troops from the Blue Mountains of Jamaica, and it so excited the white people that they threatened to go away.

Mr. LODGE. I am not discussing the possessions of Great Britain there. They are there. They have always been there. Great Britain is not seeking to interfere with us. We are not seeking to interfere with her possessions, but the fact that there is one foreign nation there does not alter the force of the argument that it is not desirable to have another.

To return to the point at which I was interrupted. The case being in that condition, the treaty pending in the Senate, the President of the United States is said by Senators on the other side to have put the treaty into practical operation by his own act. I need not go over the ground, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, that the President of the Dominican Republic appointed a man designated by the President of the United States, and that under a decree of the Dominican Republic that man and his assistants have collected the revenues of Santo Domingo.

There is not one single arrangement beyond the division of the amount of revenue which has a counterpart in the treaty. The President by that arrangement, which the Dominican Government submitted to him and which he accepted, has maintained the status in the island and prevented it from going to wreck while the treaty was pending. Nothing is more common than to make arrangements for maintaining a status during the pendency of a treaty.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator, from his great familiarity with these matters, cite us to another case in which one party maintained the relationship of both parties; in other words, where one party not only undertook for himself to preserve the status quo, but also took upon himself the obligation to preserve the status quo for the other fellow?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, nobody undertook to preserve the status quo. That is a common provision in treaties. The Senator can look over the treaties and conventions in our collection of treaties and in other collections and he will find it is a very common provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that, but——

Mr. LODGE. There is no such provision in this treaty, and it would not have expedited matters if there had been. The President of the Dominican Republic made an arrangement, with the approval of our Executive, for the maintenance of the status quo in Santo Domingo.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I understand it, from the documents that have been furnished, the President himself made the decree, and then the Dominican people, or the Dominican President, accepted it, and the proclamation of Morales is subsequent to the order of the President to the War Department to detail Colonel Colton. One is dated in April and the other is dated in March, and the President's order is dated in March.

Mr. LODGE. Of course the request was submitted through the usual diplomatic channels to the President, asking him if he would make such a designation. He was asked to do it, and when they were informed that he would, they made the necessary decree and proclaimed it; and that is all that has been done. My own judgment is that the President would have been derelict in his duty if he had not done that precise thing.

I think, Mr. President, it is extremely important that that treaty should be ratified. I can not enter upon a discussion of the details of the treaty here, and I have no desire to do so. It is not properly before us. It is quite true that the treaty is not——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish right here to ask the Senator, as he is commenting upon the treaty——

Mr. LODGE. I am not going to comment on the treaty.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, he is referring to it, and I wish to ask him whether he does not think it would be advisable to discuss that treaty in the open Senate?

Mr. LODGE. I do not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Here let me say that whilst I object to the method in which the President has intervened in this matter, I realize that there is a situation which requires serious consideration by the Government of the United States, and perhaps action. But I believe that as we are now considering a new policy with reference to the Central American, South American, and Caribbean republics, which are hopelessly involved in debt, we should take the entire country into our confidence and discuss that entire question before the entire people. I believe the end of such a discussion, aided by the public judgment as expressed in discussion elsewhere, in newspapers and in periodicals, would be to reach a just conclusion.

I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts as one of the influential members of the Committee on Foreign Relations to favor a resolution making this treaty a matter of open discussion in the Senate. Already I understand it has been discussed by the President practically in his public utterances, and I see no reason why we should not discuss it before the American people. I ask the Senator whether he would not favor such a resolution?

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President, I should not favor it, and I do not care to discuss it now, for it does not seem to be at all apposite to what I am trying to discuss, which is the general policy which has been adopted. This task in Santo Domingo is not an agreeable one, as I have said; but if we now reject this treaty, if we now abandon this policy, if the President withdraws the ships and leaves the island alone, on what ground can we rightfully interfere with some other nation which goes down there to collect her debts?

We are told that it is not an infringement of the Monroe doctrine; that they may go down there and take the custom-houses and that doing so would not infringe the Monroe doctrine. When we withdraw and foreign vessels go down there and foreign marines are landed and custom-houses are taken possession of by foreign troops, I think you will find that the American people will consider that the Monroe doctrine is involved.

Now, that is the precise situation I wish to avoid. I do not believe it can be avoided wisely and well in any way but by the one proposed in the treaty. I think the President pursued the precisely correct course in the line which he has taken. He has kept the matter so that if the treaty should be ratified nothing would be lost, and that we shall not be complicated by changes in the fiscal administration of the island in the meantime.

These attacks, Mr. President, are aimed at the President of the United States, with the idea apparently of creating an impression that he is a usurper, seeking to break through the constitutional limitations which have been drawn about his great office. He has the right to interpret the Constitution, as we have, and he is as loyal to it, and has always been as loyal to it, as any of his critics.

This same charge was made during the campaign when he was a candidate for election to the Presidency. It was made the main issue that he was a dangerous man, disposed to break down and disregard the Constitution of the United States. The question was fought out before the people of the United States, and those who made the charge got their answer at the polls. They failed to convince the people of the United States that there was one particle of truth in their charge; and this dangerous man, whom they held up as likely to involve the country in war, has made the greatest achievement of his Administration the establishment of peace between two great warring nations.

Mr. President, every step the President has taken has been in the interests of peace, our own peace, and that of the world. I believe this treaty to be another important movement, not merely for the peace and prosperity of the little disorderly Republic of Santo Domingo, but for the maintenance of peace and the removal of causes of discord in American waters and in the American hemisphere.

This old attack upon the President has now been renewed. It failed utterly when the President was a candidate for election before the great tribunal of the American people. It will fail again and react upon its author. What is the use of trying to arouse feeling now when the President has received the great indorsement of the American voters, when he has passed out finally and irrevocably from the region of candidates for the office of President, and put his refusal in his own words as explicitly and as honestly as man could do it? Yet they charge with usurpation a man who refused not merely to be a candidate, but even to accept the great office if it were again offered to him, because he said that although technically he had not received two terms, practically he had, and he wished to live up to the customs and the traditions which had been established by Washington.

A man who is as sensitive as that, Mr. President, to the traditions of his country, I think can be trusted not to violate the Constitution openly or secretly in an agreement with another nation. He has aimed, and aimed alone, in this policy at the promotion of the peace and well-being of the great islands which lie near our shores. The policy involved is something much more important than any little details which may be in the treaty. It is a question whether we are going to maintain in the West Indies a condition of peace and progress and ordered liberty, not on account of the Monroe doctrine, but to the end that danger to the Monroe doctrine and all that such danger imports need never arise.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, with very much that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has stated as to the power of this nation I fully agree. I am particularly opposed, though, to some remarks that he has made within the last few moments. We have before the Senate of the United States a treaty which is to be considered in secret session, although it has been made public. Everybody knows what it is. I have expressed my opinion on it everywhere, as I have a right to do. I am now charged by the Senator from Massachusetts with attacking the President because I do not agree with that treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, Mr. President, I was not referring to the Senator from Colorado or his opposition to the treaty. The Senator knows to what I was referring.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator was not referring to me individually, because I have not spoken on this question, but the Senator knows very well what my attitude has been on the treaty. He knows very well that I am not in favor of it. I am opposed to it.

The question really before us when we come to consider the treaty is not the power of the President to make a treaty, but whether the treaty will be beneficial and useful to us or whether it may not be dangerous to us. That is the question, Mr. President; but I can not discuss it here, I suppose; at least the Senator says I can not, and I know that if I should try it the door would be shut on me instantly.

Mr. PATTERSON. The treaty has been made public.

Mr. TELLER. The treaty has been made public, but it is said I can not discuss it all the same, and I am not disposed to discuss it. I do not believe in the theory of government that closes the doors except in extreme cases. I have contended here for twenty-five years for an open Senate upon treaties that do not involve any great amount of foreign concern—I mean European concern—but I know it can not be had. I am going to comply with the rule and not discuss it, not even as much as the Senator from Massachusetts has done. I want to stand upon my right here to pass upon a treaty and to discuss it, when the proper time comes, in terms and measures proper for a United States Senator to use.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] yesterday spent a long time to show the power of the President of the United States over foreign affairs. The Constitution fixes the power of the President of the United States over foreign affairs as certainly as it fixes the power of the members of this body or of the body itself. I do not deny that the President of the United States may initiate a treaty. He may propose a treaty to us. But I do deny that the President can make a treaty or a protocol or agreement or modus vivendi with any power coming from the United States unless this body here, by two-thirds of the Senators present, shall agree that he may make such a treaty. When he sends his proposed treaty here it is as dead as Julius Cæsar until we by our consent shall give it life.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. There is complaint made—it has been made here, it has been made in the press—that the President has attempted at least to put in operation a proposed treaty. The Senator from Wisconsin said yesterday he had not put it in operation. He certainly has not put it in operation on the part of the Government of the United States, because he has not the authority so to do. When he said, as he did say at Jamestown, where the Chautauqua was being held, that the Government had put it in operation, he was mistaken as to his power and mistaken as to the law; and the Senator from Wisconsin is much nearer right when he says he did not put it in operation than is the President when he says he did put it in operation.

But, Mr. President, for all practical purposes this proposed treaty is now doing service. If it was ratified by the President after we had consented to it, the status quo would be exactly as it is now; there would be no difference. Not a single thing down there would be done under the treaty that is not being done now, that I know of. That has nothing to do with the merit of the treaty. It may have something to do with the administration of public affairs.

Mr. President, no matter who may be the President nor what claims he may have upon the public for his great ability and honesty, I am not willing to admit that any man can, under the Constitution of this country, make an agreement with a foreign power and put it in operation. The Constitution marks out plainly his relation to foreign affairs. He may appoint ambassadors, ministers, and consuls. That is, he may do that with the advice of this body. He can not do it without. He may make treaties with our advice. He can not do it without.

The other day it seemed to me that the discussion took the form of a complaint because we wanted some information from the State Department, information that it turns out now any Member could have had by walking up to the State Department and asking leave to look at the papers. What I am entitled to do as a Senator this body as a body is entitled to do. That is a complete answer to all the claim in the discussion that was had with closed doors, to which I suppose I can not refer, that we were invading another branch of the Government, the executive department, by such a resolution.

There are more than a hundred resolutions that could be read here to-day where the Senate has called upon the executive department to give them information, that has come to us sometimes in the open Senate, frequently with the seal of secrecy on it. There are some cases where the President has stated: "I do not consider it compatible with the public interest to give that information now." "Subsequently," in one case, he said, "I hope to be able to give it."

Mr. President, in all the inquiries made in more than a hundred years there is not a single line to show that any Executive ever took offense at a resolution here. The President recognized what Madison said was an emergency duty on his part and on ours when it came to treaty making. We are as much a part of the treaty-making power as he, and a little more. Mr. President, for while he has a veto on the treaty after we have said "You may ratify it," as the Senator from Wisconsin said yesterday and once before, I believe, after all, the custom has been that when this body amended a treaty, or when this body consented to the ratification of a treaty, that treaty has been ratified; and I recall no instance in my reading and none in my public service where a treaty, having been amended by the Senate as it might, the President has refused to ratify it because of that amendment——

Mr. BACON. It was done in the recent general arbitration treaty.

Mr. TELLER. Wait until I get through. It has been done in no case, I say, until the case that occurred within a very short time. I said I knew of no other.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not know that I care to take up that question, because I did not rise to make a general speech. I did not rise to criticise the President. I rose to present a few of what I think are the principles which ought to govern this body and to repudiate some things I have heard here to-day. I mean for myself to maintain the right the Constitution gives to this body, not because I want the prerogative. It is not mine. It is the prerogative of the body. You could no more avoid exercising these duties——

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TELLER. I will simply say the Senate must exercise the duty of making treaties, and it must exercise it with judgment and discretion, and not simply take the treaty the President sends us, good or bad, as he may dictate. If the Senator wants to ask a question I will yield.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, Mr. President, I am in entire accord, as every Senator must be, with the proposition which the Senator makes. I wanted to ask the Senator whether in his experience or as a result of his study (and I know of no one who has been a more industrious student of our history) he has known of any request, public or private, open or secret, by this body upon a President of the United States that he shall communicate the instructions given by him to diplomatic agents in the absence of a pending treaty before the body?

Mr. TELLER. If I had a little time I could do it. I have had my attention called by my study within the last ten days to cases where requests have been made by this body for the instructions given to ministers who were negotiating treaties.

Mr. SPOONER. I was asking for information.

Mr. TELLER. I have right here, if I could turn to it in a moment, in the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, one of those cases where the President returned in secret what the instructions had been.

Mr. President, there was allusion made here to-day to the fact that the President of the United States has the right to come here when we make treaties and sit in the Senate. I believe there is only one instance of it, and that is where George Washington came here, giving the Senate notice that on a certain day he would appear. He came here and consulted the Senate about a treaty not made, not drafted, not what some of the Senators call a protocol, nor a project; but in that case he wanted to know what the Senate thought about it, and he came here to discuss it beforehand, before he prepared the treaty. On several occasions Washington sent a message to the Senate saying: "I would like to make a treaty of this character. Will it be satisfactory to the Senate?" He said, "I should like to know whether the Senate would be willing that I should make a treaty to pay $40,000 to the Algerine pirates, or would the Senate be willing to put it higher than that, if it became necessary." I have not found what the answer to that was, except that the treaty was made and we paid the money. There can be half a dozen cases of that kind cited.

Mr. Lincoln sent to the Senate a treaty made by Mr. Corwin in Mexico. It was that we should join in the defense of Mexico against the combined powers of Europe. We were to award or guarantee certain expenditures of money. That is all we were asked to do. The Senate did not take up the treaty and pass on it. It passed a resolution saying it was not, in their judgment, wise that it should be done, and sent it to Mr. Lincoln. Later Mr. Lincoln, referring to this same action of the Senate, sent back a treaty on a different line, from Mr. Corwin, who was still our minister there, and who had negotiated something with Mexico of a different character.

There has not been, until within a few years, that absolute claim for independence on the part of the State Department, I will say, and the sensitiveness that appears sometimes to be growing, if we may take the statement of the friends of the Administration here as representing how they feel. None such existed then. There was a feeling between the Executive and the Senate that they were doing a duty put on them by the Constitution. The President, by the Constitution, is the maker of treaties. Our fathers followed what was the world's practice. Everywhere, so far as I know, in those days the sovereign made the treaty. Even in powers that had legislatures the legislative power had no interest or control over a treaty. I think that now France has a system something like ours, and perhaps some other country may, but I do not know of any other country that does.

Mr. MONEY. Denmark.

Mr. TELLER. "Denmark," the Senator says. Perhaps so. But, Mr. President, those are things that have grown up in later years. They did not exist originally. The old Roman senate made the only treaties that were made, because the executive power at that time was supposed to be lodged in the senate. Our fathers did not think it was wise to leave it to the Executive, and in the discussion in the convention it will be seen that there was not only a feeling that it was not wise to leave it with the Executive and the Senate, but there was a strong party there who thought the treaty must be passed on also by the House. During President Washington's Administration the House made such a claim by calling on the President for information touching a treaty then in controversy, which he declined to send for the reason that the House was not charged with any duty in that particular. I believe that practically settled the matter. The House has no right.

But, Mr. President, the Senate was confined to making treaties that were recognized to be legitimate and proper for a sovereign to make in those days, except the limitation the Constitution put upon us. I do not think this body could make a treaty by which we could dismember the Union. I do not think we could give up any of the territory that belongs to the United States by a treaty. I think if we did the House of Representatives would undoubtedly come into the arena. I do not know but we could as a Congress do that with the consent of the President. I do not mean that we could dismember a State, but we could perhaps get rid of Alaska by a Congressional act if we saw fit to do so. I do not believe, however, that the Senate of the United States and the President, without the concurrence of the House of Representatives, could get rid of Alaska under our Constitution.

Mr. President, I do not intend to make any long discussion on this question. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] alluded to Cuba and our interference there as a defense of our interference in Santo Domingo. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that a condition might become so intolerable in Santo Domingo as to require the interference of the United States, but I deny the right of the Executive of the United States to make such interference. When the condition grew so bad in Cuba, why did not the then President of the United States interfere? The whole people of the United States were clamoring for interference in the affairs of Cuba. A hundred Members of the House of Representatives, of his own political faith, met in caucus and declared that it was the duty of the Government to interfere.

Why did the President not interfere? He recognized that that was the duty of Congress; that Congress alone could interfere, and Congress did interfere. I do not mean to say that the body and the other acting under the Constitution might not interfere; I will not say that they should not interfere; but that is not the case presented. It is like putting up a man of straw to say we may do this, that, or the other.

Nobody denies the President's right to withhold a treaty after we have consented to its ratification; nobody could doubt that; it has been done, not because the Senate amended the treaty, but because conditions arose that made the Executive think that it ought not to be put in operation. I do not hesitate to say that the President of the United States has the right to withhold a treaty that we have amended here which he thought would be objectionable to foreign powers if he sent it to them. That is his right.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. I of course concur with the Senator as to the Senate's participation under the Constitution as a part of the treaty-making power; but does the Senator claim, under the Constitution, that the Senate has any part or lot whatever with the President of the United States in the negotiation of treaties, or in the negotiations with foreign governments that may or may not lead to the signing of treaties?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have cited a case where the first President of the United States thought it was very proper to consult the Senate before he attempted to send the draft of a treaty to the Senate. I do not know that it is necessary to do that, but if we knew the President of the United States was engaged in the negotiation of a treaty which the Senate would not ratify, or might not ratify, I think it would be courteous to inform the President that we would not consent to ratify it. I think it would be courteous for us to say, just as was done in the case I mentioned in reference to Mexico, by a resolution of the Senate, "We do not think it is wise to make that treaty." It is no invasion of the power of the President or of his right when we make that declaration to him, and it ought to be accepted in a friendly way, this branch having just as much power as he in the matter of treaties.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator would not claim that such a resolution would be anything more than advisory, would he? It would not be at all binding upon the President, would it?

Mr. TELLER. The President can no more make a treaty than the Senator from Wisconsin can make one.

Mr. SPOONER. I know that.

Mr. TELLER. And when he sends here what is miscalled "a treaty," it is not a treaty at all.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, but, Mr. President, the Senator misunderstands me. I understood the Senator to speak of the passage by the Senate of a resolution regarding a treaty which it was understood the President was negotiating.

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator surely does not intend to be understood as saying that the passage of a resolution of that sort, pending any negotiation of a treaty by the President, would be anything more than advisory to the President. It would not be binding upon him, would it?

Mr. TELLER. Of course he could go on and have his clerks draft the treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. And he could go on and negotiate the treaty, sign it, and send it to the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. He would have the power to sign it, if he wanted to, but it would be an idle thing for the President to do if he knew the Senate of the United States would not consent to its ratification. I do not believe it possible that we shall ever get a President who would do so foolish and absurd a thing as that, although, of course, nobody can tell what in the course of time may happen in that direction. I have seen some gentlemen who were aspiring to that office who, possibly, if they could ever be elected, might do something of that kind, but the chances of their election are so remote that I do not think the Senator or I need cause ourselves any uneasiness for fear such a discourteous thing would be done to the Senate as making the draft of a treaty which the Senate had said it would not ratify.

Mr. SPOONER. There is that much more reason, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, why the Senate should not inject into a negotiation conducted by the President in a constitutional way a prejudgment as to what the body would do if the President did not discontinue the negotiation.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it may be that that is correct.

Mr. SPOONER. In other words, if the Senator will permit me another interruption——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I have always assumed that the Senate would not commit itself hastily for or against a treaty, that it would abide the debate amongst members of this body and in the other branch which prevails in such discussion before they would in any wise become bound one way or the other, that the Senate would never pursue any course in relation to a treaty which would deprive the people of the benefit of the unfettered judgment, upon full debate, of the members of the body in that interest.

Mr. TELLER. The Senate might have that unfettered debate before the treaty was made.

Mr. SPOONER. Before it found out what it was?

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I do not want to take time by mingling in this little colloquy between the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] as to the authority of the Executive, but I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the constitutional provision on that point. It is that—

He—

shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

That would seem to carry out the inferences of the first President, who did consult us in the case cited by the Senator from Colorado, but the Constitution does not use the same language when it comes to the matter of appointments. It says that the President—shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States.

It might as well be inferred that the President shall negotiate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, make treaties as that he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, make appointments. I will say to my friend from Wisconsin that I am not denying the right of the President to make treaties, but I say that ground might be very well taken, in view of the precedents cited by the Senator from Colorado and the language used in the same paragraph about the right to make nominations and appointments by the consent of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care to dwell upon that. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin in his statement that we are neither a baby nation nor a hermit nation; but I must say that I can hardly see why that declaration should be made in this body. I was not aware that there was anyone here who believed that we were either a hermit nation or a baby nation. If that was addressed to those of us who do not believe in this Santo Domingo treaty, there was no reason why it should have been addressed to us, for none of us entertains any such crude idea as that.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. In the first place, I did not say what the Senator attributes to me. I stated that it was never intended by the framers of this Government that we should be either a puny or a baby or a hermit nation. At that time I was discussing entirely the question of the strictures upon the President for sending delegates to the Moroccan conference. I had no reference whatever to the Santo Domingo treaty. What I said yesterday on the subject of the Santo Domingo treaty I would say if I were opposed to the treaty on principle as quickly as if I were for it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the making of such a statement puts the Senators who are in opposition to the treaty before the country as if they were condemning it on some such idea as that.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] spent some time to show that we could make treaties with other nations by which we would agree to do certain things, such as the Morocco treaty we made some years ago, when we signed a treaty with six or eight other powers; I do not remember how many.

Why, Mr. President, I do not suppose there is anybody here who has ever doubted our right to do that. We have a right to make such a treaty, and we have a right to do it if we do it as the Constitution provides we may do it, for we have a right to do what any other nation in the world has a right to do. We could make a treaty of alliance with Great Britain if we saw fit so to do, though I should regret to see it done. That, however, is a question of judgment for the Senate and the President of the United States. But, Mr. President, it will not do to put this Santo Domingo case upon that theory. You can not carry through a treaty that the President may have power to make simply by proving that he has the power to make it, nor can you carry through a treaty that shall come to us from the coast of Africa simply because the President has power to make it. This body must pass on it; this body must agree to it as much as the President himself. I insist, as the burden is upon us as much as it is upon him, as the responsibility is as great upon this Senate as it is upon the Executive, that our right to all the information he has is as good as his right would be to any information that he desired from this body.

Mr. President, in the course of this debate a great many things have been drawn in which I do not propose to touch upon; but the principal point in the debate was whether there was a condition down in Santo Domingo brought about by the President of the United States that was practically the same as it would be if the treaty had been ratified by our advice and consent. I have said heretofore that I did not believe any change in the existing condition would be made if that treaty were put in operation.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] contributed what I think was a very important piece of evidence to this controversy, to the effect that the President of the United States assumes now that he has practically put in force this treaty. The President in the last message he sent to us states this very question:

> This brings me to what should be one of the fundamental objects of the Monroe doctrine.

You notice he does not say that it is one of the fundamental doctrines, but what should be one of the fundamental doctrines.

> We must ourselves in good faith try to help upward toward peace and order those of our sister republics which need such help.

Certainly not, Mr. President, unless the sister republics ask it. It is no part of our duty to go out as missionaries, lifting up other people. Even if we had the power, it may be doubted whether we ought to do anything of that kind.

> Just as there has been a gradual growth of the ethical element in the relations of one individual to another, so we are, even though slowly, more and more coming to recognize the duty of bearing one another's burdens, not only as among individuals, but also as among nations.

I deny that there is any authority in the President of the United States to commit us to any policy under which we should bear the burdens of any other nation. If Congress sees fit to do it, Congress, perhaps, within the power granted to it, may possibly do so, although I should think that would be very doubtful.

Then the President turns to Santo Domingo and says:

> Santo Domingo, in her turn, has now made an appeal to us to help her, and not only every principle of widsom but every generous instinct within us bids us to respond to the appeal. It is not of the slightest consequence whether we grant the aid needed by Santo Domingo as an incident to the wise development of the Monroe doctrine, or because we regard the case of Santo Domingo as standing wholly by itself, and to be treated as such, and not on general principles or with any reference to the Monroe doctrine.

I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to declare that there was no new doctrine here; that there was no new development. This is a declaration on the part of the President, at least, that he thinks there has been a new development of the Monroe doctrine, or rather a wise development. I suppose that is what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] the other day called the "Roosevelt doctrine," as contradistinguished from the Monroe doctrine.

The President goes on at some length—and I will not read all he says in this connection—to argue the question; but I want to call attention to something that he said on the following page:

> Accordingly the Executive Department of our Government negotiated a treaty under which we are to try to help the Dominican people to straighten out their finances. This treaty is pending before the Senate. In the meantime a temporary arrangement has been made which will last until the Senate has had time to take action upon the treaty.

If that is not a declaration that the arrangement has been made by the Government, I do not understand the meaning of plain English language. On another page he says, referring to the action under the treaty:

> We shall ourselves thoroughly examine all these claims, whether American or foreign, and see that none that are improper are paid. There is, of course, opposition to the treaty from dishonest creditors, foreign and American, and from the professional revolutionists of the island itself. We have already reason to believe that some of the creditors who do not dare expose their claims to honest scrutiny are endeavoring to stir up sedition in the island and opposition to the treaty.

That, at least, is not very flattering to the Senate of the United States, which, through one session of Congress, declined to take up that treaty.

On yesterday the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] read an extract from a speech of the President delivered at Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 11, 1905. I will not read it again, but I ask to have it put in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and then I shall drop that part of the subject.

The extract referred to is a follows:

> Accordingly the executive department of our Government negotiated a treaty under which we are to try to help the Dominican people to straighten out their finances. This treaty is pending before the Senate, whose consent to it is necessary. In the meantime we have made a temporary arrangement which will last until the Senate has had time to take action upon the treaty. Under this arrangement we see to the honest administration of the custom-houses, collecting the revenues, turning over 45 per cent to the Government for running expenses and putting the other 55 per cent into a safe deposit for equitable division among the various creditors, whether European or American, accordingly as, after investigation, their claims seem just.
> The custom-houses offer well-nigh the only sources of revenue in Santo Domingo, and the different revolutions usually have as their real aim the obtaining possession of these custom-houses. The mere fact that we are protecting the custom-houses and collecting the revenue with efficiency and honesty has completely discouraged all revolutionary movement, while it has already produced such an increase in the revenues that the Government is actually getting more from the 45 per cent that we turn over to it than it got formerly when it took the entire revenue.

Mr. TELLER. There has been considerable discussion in the Senate——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire whether the Senator questions the President's power to do this, or is it a question of policy? I have not been able to gather clearly from his remarks whether the Senator questions the President's power to do it.

Mr. TELLER. To do what?

Mr. HEYBURN. To make the arrangement which he admits having made, and to which the Senator has just referred, with reference to the collection of the revenues and customs of Santo Domingo.

Mr. TELLER. If I desired to inquire what power the President has to do a thing, I should look in the Constitution and see what the Constitution authorizes him to do. I deny utterly that the President has the right to make any arrangement or treaty—and I so stated in beginning my remarks, when the Senator was probably not here—I deny that he has the right to make any arrangement of that kind and call it a treaty or a modus vivendi or a protocol or anything else; and he has no right to put in operation any system of government in the island without first having the consent of the Senate, no matter whether it is written or verbal.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know if the Senator uses the word "right" as synonymous with "power." The Senator has used the word "right." He says the President "had no right to do it." Does that mean he had no power to do it?

Mr. TELLER. I mean he had no right under the Constitution to do it; he had no authority to do it. I do not mean to say that he can not do it by mere force, in violation of law; I do not mean to say that he can not send down there men and put them in charge of the custom-houses; but I do say that his doing it is without the slightest authority of law; and every act of the President of the United States without authority of law is absolutely void, as the Senator from Idaho knows as well as anybody else in this Chamber; it is nugatory.

There has been a good deal of debate about some legislation that ought to be had. As I am speaking to the shipping bill now, I believe, though I am not sure as to the particular bill that is pending——

Mr. GALLINGER. The pure-food bill, I will suggest to the Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. TELLER. The pure-food bill. I know what I am trying to speak about, but I do not know the particular bill which is pending. Freedom of debate in the Senate is such that we are entitled to speak on any subject, and I thank God that we are, because it is the only body under the Government in which there can be open discussion. It is the only place where the spoken word can go to the people; and a great writer on international law and liberty has declared that the right of free and full discussion of public affairs is the dearest thing that a free people could have and the last thing that they should surrender.

Although here in the Senate we may sometimes transcend the usual ideas of debate and go beyond what in other places is permissible, yet after a hundred years or more no injury has come to the Republic by the action of this body.

I am about to call the attention of the Senate to some things touching this body which, I think, are of especial interest just now. I believe I can say without offense, and everybody will admit its truth, that the Senate is somewhat in a shadow, or, in ordinary parlance, under a cloud. In the last few months there have been newspaper articles, magazine articles, and various declarations in public—some of them where they ought not to have been made—to the effect that this body is an obstruction, and that the Senate stands as an objection and a hindrance to the reforms that are desired in certain circles.

The other day one of the newspapers of this city had a long article—and I want to digress far enough to say that I am not going to charge that on the Executive, for I know how irresponsible some newspapers are, and I know how responsible some others are. I know that frequently they may get wrong information, which they think is correct. The article to which I allude does not pretend to come from the Executive, consequently, whatever I say about the condition of the Senate must not be taken as a reply to anything that the Executive has said or even thought. I am not going to read all of the article; I will read only the first few lines. In order to establish the authenticity of the statement the article says:

> Through a source so close to the President that its authenticity can not be doubted, it is learned that the Administration is convinced that interests in Congress hostile to railroad rate legislation are creating a fog of opposition to the Roosevelt foreign policies under which to disguise their organized plans to defeat the reforms to which President Roosevelt stands committed before the world.
> From the Administration viewpoint these antagonistic interests are seeking to show that the President's foreign policies, particularly with reference to Latin-America, prove him to be ambitious to drag the United States into world politics with a reckless disregard of George Washington's admonition against "foreign entanglements," to the end that the name of Theodore Roosevelt may live in the history of his country as one of the few Presidents who "did things."
> In support of this contention friends of the President point to the threatening rows thus early in the record of the Fifty-ninth Congress over his course in these various affairs—

Then Santo Domingo is named, a subject which I have been discussing as much as I dare in the open Senate. Then the article continues:

> Panama.
> Venezuela.
> Morocco.
> China.
> Presumably, it is the theory of the opposition to the President's programme for railroad reform—granting, of course, that the Administration's diagnosis of the hidden causes of the opposition is correct—that if it can be shown that he has erred in his foreign policies he will, to a greater or less extent, be discredited before the country, and that with this accomplished the opposition will be emboldened to fight his other proposals vigorously and openly without hazarding the risk of arousing the implacable wrath of their constituencies.

I know what the President is doing in Santo Domingo and I know what his proposition is; I do not agree with it; but I do not know what is meant by the reference to Panama. I do not know what the President wants to do in relation to the Panama Canal. I have made some remarks on the floor of the Senate on that subject, and I defy any man to torture anything I have said into an attack upon the President or his policy. In the argument which I attempted to make I contended simply that what we wanted to do was to build the best canal in the world, if we built any; that there was but one canal that would meet the demands of commerce, and that was a sea-level canal. Whether the President is in favor of a sea-level canal or a lock canal I do not know. I myself did not in the slightest degree—and perhaps I made as extended a speech as was made on this subject—criticise the President. I did not take up the question that was discussed here somewhat as to the wisdom of certain appointments and salaries. My position on that subject I should like to define in just a moment. Congress gave to the President of the United States the power to build the canal within a certain limit. I did not vote for the bill. I did not think it was right. I think now it was vicious legislation. I stated on the floor of the Senate when that bill had passed and had become a law that I should faithfully endeavor as a Senator to carry out its provisions and make the canal a success; and I would feel myself recreant to my trust here if I should directly or indirectly put a hindrance to the efforts of the Executive to build the canal.

I deny here that the President ought to be subjected to criticism for the mistakes which people say he has made. When Congress conferred that authority upon him, it must have known that in all human affairs men are liable to make mistakes. We ought to have known that no man could construct this great work unless he was learned and experienced in that kind of business; and we put this duty upon the President of the United States with his multitudinous duties otherwise, and we must have presumed that he would do the work with agents and with such agents as he might select, and we ought to have understood that he would make mistakes. We left it to him, and if he thought it was necessary, in order to get a good man to build it, to pay him $50,000, that is what we instructed him to do—to act upon his own judgment and not ours. We abandoned our control over the subject for the present at least. While we can repeal that act, there has been no indication for more than three years that Congress intends to abandon that policy and adopt any other. I think we ought to repeal the act. I think we ought to provide some better and safer method, but until we do that let us leave the President of the United States to carry out this work upon the very theory on which we turned it over to him—because he was better qualified to do it than we.

The statement on my part or on the part of anybody else that the work is not being well done and that some other method ought to be adopted, is no attempt to interfere with the doing of the work and is no implication that the President has not discharged his duty as well as we expected he would.

Some day I shall have something further to say on the Panama Canal, but I do not desire to say it now.

The next is Venezuela. Just exactly what we have to do about Venezuela now I do not know, and I certainly do not know what the Executive proposes to do. I am not in his confidence. I do not believe anyone in this body knows what is to be done with Venezuela. Whether there will be war with France or whether there will be peace in Venezuela nobody now knows. That is a question which has not yet been presented to Congress, and if the President presents it I have no doubt we shall deal with it according to the best judgment we have and with such information as we may be able to get.

Morocco we have discussed.

I do not know that there has been any criticism in this body of his policy toward China. I do not know that there has been anything done here which could possibly under any condition of affairs be said to be hostile to the purpose of the President in reference to China.

But the important item of legislation before this body and the House is the question of regulating railroads and their rates. A year ago last December the President of the United States sent us a message in which he declared a principle upon which he thought it wise for us to pass a law. He said he thought it would be wise to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power, whenever a railroad had made a rate that was unfair or unreasonable, to change the rate and put the new rate in operation until the railroad should go into some court and there have it set aside as an improper decision on the part of the Commission.

At the last session of Congress the House sent us a bill. It was called the "Esch-Townsend bill." It came here, I think, about three or four weeks before Congress adjourned by law. We had before us one of the important things of that session, and that was an impeachment case. It was a judicial hearing by this body. It was a hearing that could not be hurried. It was a hearing upon which every Senator was to act as a judge, and nothing that came before this body could justify us in neglecting our duty in that particular.

Then there were left about two weeks before Congress was compelled to adjourn. There is nowhere a man who is disposed to be fair, and who knows anything of public affairs, who knows anything of the difficulty of dealing with this question, who can say that we could have dealt with it in the two weeks. We in this body ought not to be charged as a body with any dereliction of duty because we did not take up and pass that bill. We had a right to pass upon these questions ourselves. Nay, more, it was our duty to do it. We were not to take up so great a subject as that, involving millions of dollars, involving great legal principles, upon which the legal profession of the nation are at sea, and pass a bill in haste.

What was this body made for? It was supposed when this body was organized that it would stand against the public cry for immediate legislation; that it would stand against the "radicalism," if I may so term it, of another body, moved, perhaps, because of their close relation to the voters of the country. We were to come, not only with clean hands, but with clean judgment. We were to look into these things.

It has been six weeks—almost eight weeks now—since Congress assembled, and yet there is no rate bill here. Can anybody say that there has been any dereliction here because the rate bill is not before this body? There is not a body of lawyers anywhere in this country who can sit down together—ninety of them, the best in the land—and agree what is the law in the first place; and if they know what the law is can agree what will be the method of enforcing the law so as to give protection not only to the shipper, but to the railroads. We can not legislate, and we will not legislate, in the interest of either of them. When we come to legislate we will take into consideration the interest of all the people and the combined capital connected with these great enterprises.

Does delay here indicate that the Senate is obstructing the President in that particular? I have here on my table—I sent over and got them—thirty-odd bills pending now in the House of Representatives touching this question, and I have seven bills which have been introduced in the Senate touching the same question. That indicates the diversity of opinion in this body and the other, and while we might perhaps get up a bill and send it over to the House, the House would have to be convinced that the bill is a good measure.

Mr. President, I am moved to say these things because the Senate is being attacked, the Senate is being derided, the Senate is being abused, because we have not with quick feet rushed to the solution of this question, which needs the wisdom of the world to settle. If we should settle it improperly, the old adage would come in that no question is settled until it has been settled right, and it would appear before us again. It is wisdom to delay, it is wisdom to take time, and it is wisdom on the part of the Executive and his friends to let the legislative body deal with this subject. He has expressed his opinion—and that is all the law authorizes him to do—and there he should stand. A proper respect for the Senate, a decent regard for the legislative body, should incline the Executive and those who stand near him to let the Senate work out this great problem as it sees fit, and not in haste.

Mr. President, I do not know that it is worth while to have said this—much more might be said—but I do think the time has come when the Senate should vindicate its right to deliberate legislation, when the Senate should vindicate its right to legislate without Executive interference. Mr. President, when the time comes I shall be ready to vote upon this question. I shall not say now how I am going to vote. I shall vote as I think the interest of the whole country demands. If I should agree with the President and vote with him, it will not be because of anything he has said or anything he has done. I take it that is the position of this membership, that we will pass upon this question because it is our duty to pass upon it and not the Executive's. We will act with the other branch of Congress, and we will not let them send us a bill here at the close of the session in hot haste and demand of us that we pass it. We will take time to deliberate on it, and when we get through all that the chances are a hundred to one we shall have made a mistake. But we shall have some excuse for the mistake we make, if we make it, after careful deliberation, after careful consideration, after we have considered every argument for and against the proposition. Then we shall be able to say to the country, if they complain, that we did the best we could.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I desire to submit some remarks upon the matters which have been debated during the day, and I now give notice that I will take the floor to-morrow after the routine morning business for the purpose of addressing the Senate.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT ELIZABETH, N. J.

Mr. KEAN. My colleague [Mr. DRYDEN] has been called from the Senate Chamber, and he asked me to make a report. On his behalf, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 846) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office at Elizabeth, N. J., I report it favorably without amendment, and submit a report thereon.

It is a short bill, and I ask unanimous consent for its present passage. It might just as well be passed now.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the bill had better go over.

Mr. KEAN. All right. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

ELIJAH R. WILKINS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2481) granting an increase of pension to Elijah J. Wilkins.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Elijah R. Wilkins, late chaplain Fifth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business, which was temporarily laid aside by request of the Senator from New Hampshire, is now before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If no one is now prepared to speak, and I think no Senator on either side of the Chamber is, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION AND MILITARY RECORD BILLS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension bills on the Calendar and also unobjected bills to correct military records.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, of course I shall not object to that order, but I should like to have the further understanding that no other business shall be transacted during the remainder of the day.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is all I desire to bring up, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 24, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 87) to authorize use of transport Sumner to convey members of Santiago Battlefield Commission and others to Cuba and return.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred House resolution No. 181, have had the same under consideration and respectfully report the following resolution in lieu thereof:

"Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this order, and daily hereafter, immediately on the approval of the Journal, so long as the bill hereinafter referred to shall be pending in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; that after the said bill shall have been read general debate shall continue until Thursday next at 3 p. m.; and at that hour, or, if general debate shall be concluded before that hour, immediately upon the conclusion of said general debate, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall rise and report the bill to the House; whereupon immediately, without debate, intervening motion, or appeal, a vote shall be taken on the bill to a final passage: Provided further, That general leave to print remarks on the bill is hereby granted for six legislative days after Thursday, the 25th day of January next."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi for a moment. I would suggest that instead of the forty minutes' debate that we would have under the rule on the previous question that we agree upon a time to be equally divided between us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Say forty-five minutes on a side.

Mr. DALZELL. That is satisfactory to me. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that an hour and a half debate be allowed upon the discussion of the rule, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that an hour and a half be allowed for debate upon the proposed rule, and that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Mississippi. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALZELL. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will say this hour and a half is to be in lieu of the forty minutes under the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this stage of the discussion to take any time further than to explain the proposition before the House. The Committee on Territories has reported to this House a bill providing for the admission to statehood of the Indian Territory and Oklahoma as one State and Arizona and New Mexico as another State. If this rule be adopted, that bill will come before the House at once for immediate discussion. The House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and general debate will continue until to-morrow at 3 o'clock. At 3 o'clock to-morrow, or at the end of general debate, if it should end sooner, a vote will be taken upon the adoption of the bill.

Having said this much, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time until later on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennslyvania reserves the remainder of his time. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the House understands the question, and yet it is important that the country should understand it as well. This rule which we are now considering is a rule to make the House vote upon a bill admitting four Territories as two States, denying to the House the right to separate the two propositions, denying to the House the right to give a separate vote in these separate Territories to the people thereof upon the question of whether or not they desire to enter the Union in the manner prescribed in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this morning in the Committee on Rules several efforts were made, as the efforts will be made here, if possible, to amend the rule itself. Gentlemen must not deceive themselves. The point of this fight is upon voting up or voting down the previous question. If the previous question is voted upon the House, then no opportunity will be left to amend either the rule or the bill. You must take the bill as it is, in its omnibus shape, or you must reject it as it is. You will have no opportunity whatsoever to admit, as an independent proposition, Oklahoma and the Indian Territory into the Union as a State; and yet there is not a man upon this floor opposed to admitting those two Territories as a State into the Union. This queer situation confronts us, that the majority is holding over the House as a whip the impossibility of admitting Oklahoma and Indian Territory, a thing that everybody desires, unless the House will do something that the House does not wish to do, to wit, at the same time, as a part of the same mouthful, admit Arizona and New Mexico, against the will of the people of Arizona, into the Union as one State; coupled together for all time as a State into the Union, with populations differing in language, differing in religion, differing in traditions, differing in customs, necessarily antagonistic to one another; admitting into the Union a State within the womb of which there will be at all times a race antagonism of the most considerable sort.

But the thing to which I am addressing myself now is the fact that this rule if passed prevents this House, representative of the people of the United States, in a matter of the very highest privilege and most permanent importance, of expressing its true will. If you adopt the previous question, that will be the end of your connection with this bill, except a vote in favor of the bill or a vote opposed to the bill. Now, if the previous question is voted down, I shall move to strike out of the rule all the language after the word "States," in line 13 of the first page of the rule. That would then bring the statehood bill into the House under the ordinary rules of the House, subject to the control and management of the House, so that the House could vote up the proposition to bring Oklahoma and Indian Territory into the Union as a State, and could vote down the proposition to bring Arizona and New Mexico into the Union as a State, or could take the opposite course, or could vote both up or could vote both down.

All that is aimed at is to give the House the control of itself; and you gentlemen over there must remember that you as a party control the House. All that we are asking is that each individual Member of you, in the interest of what is good for the general welfare of the country, may have an opportunity to vote upon each of these items separately; may have an opportunity to amend this bill and make it better for everybody. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Now, you understand the proposition. There can not be any mistake about it; every one of you knows if you vote the previous question upon this House that you cut off the opportunity of admitting Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, no matter how advisable or wise and absolutely just and requisite it may be, unless at the same time the population of Arizona is forced into an unwilling marriage with the population of New Mexico, and the population of New Mexico into an unwilling marriage with the population of Arizona.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed six minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we have yet to hear the arguments that will be made on this side in support of this resolution. So we can only guess what these arguments shall be. I hope that the motion for the previous question on this resolution will be voted down, and that the motion which will then be made, to strike out all after the word "States," in line 13 of the rule, will be carried. The House will then proceed to the consideration of this bill under the rules of the House, and every Member here will have an opportunity to record his honest judgment on this measure and all features of it.

I know it will be said, Mr. Speaker, that this is a party measure, and therefore those on this side should vote for the rule. Mr. Speaker, nothing can ever be made a Republican party measure save and alone by the action of the Republican party. The only official action that has ever been taken by our party on the question of statehood for Arizona and New Mexico has been contrary to the provisions of this bill. No measure can ever be made a Republican measure that does violence to the wishes and desires of the people of two great Territories of the Union, and we know that practically every man, woman, and child in Arizona is opposed to the jointure of the two Territories; and only by reason of the fact that the people of New Mexico have been assured that they must accept this jointure or remain out of the Union have they tardily, reluctantly acquiesced in a procedure which makes them unwilling parties to the outrage of a sister Territory.

We can not escape the responsibility we owe our constituents by voluntarily tying our own hands and placing ourselves in a position where we can not vote in accordance with the dictates of our conscience and the promptings of our judgment on this measure. Practically all are agreed in regard to the bringing of the Territory of Oklahoma into the Union. There is wide difference of opinion in this body, as is known to every Member, with reference to the action which should be taken with regard to Arizona and New Mexico. There are some who believe that both should be admitted separately; there are others who believe that neither Territory should be admitted at this time, and there is unquestionably a majority here who, if their hands and votes are not tied by this rule, will insist that these two Territories, promised through the act that established the government of Arizona separate statehood, promised by the voice of the Republican party in convention assembled, separate statehood, shall not be joined against their will in an unwieldy, inharmonious State.

I hope, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the previous question will be voted down, and that an opportunity will be given to the Members of this House to express their judgment on this measure, to the end that the people of those two Territories in the Southwest may have justice done them; that this violence to the pledges of our party shall not be accomplished, and that our party may continue to be what it always has been—a party true to its every pledge and promise; a party that does justice and equity. [Loud applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I could not hear anything the gentleman said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time did the gentleman consume?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman consumed six minutes. Occupants of the galleries will please not converse; gentlemen on the floor of the House will please be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will now consume some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I will not attempt to disguise the position of the Republican party on this floor in the support of the rule pending and ultimately the bill as reported from the Committee on Territories. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] appeals to the House to waive politics, and, whatever we do, to avoid tying anybody's hands. I should like to know what light the gentleman has seen so suddenly. I have before me the RECORD of the long session of the last Congress, showing the pendency of a rule exactly similar to this one in all important respects; a demand for the previous question and the vote of the gentleman from Wyoming in favor of the previous question; secondly, in favor of the rule, and, thirdly, in favor of the bill itself.

Mr. DALZELL. And, if my colleague will allow me to interrupt him at this point, fourthly, in favor of a rule which took the bill out of the Committee on Territories and sent it to conference disagreeing in the Senate amendments—votes on four different occasions.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Gagging the House of Representatives and tying up the hands of the House of Representatives! Why, Mr. Speaker, the event figured in by St. Paul on his way down to Damascus was not a circumstance compared with the glorious blaze of light that has suddenly attacked the gentleman from Wyoming; and without any apology, without any explanation, he comes here and undertakes to drive his views through this House by an appeal against a rule of this arbitrary character.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will permit me, the world has benefited a great deal by the light which appeared to Paul.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the world has not been benefited by the light that the gentleman from Wyoming has shed on this question. [Laughter.] He parted company with his great predecessor at that particular point in the place where the ways parted. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a party measure, and if we shall have a debate upon this bill ultimately I will show from the records that from the day when Vermont was admitted into the fellowship and partnership of the thirteen original States down to the present time no State ever came into this Union that was not the offspring and outgrowth of party investigation and party consideration. The State that I live in, the State that I love, the State that I, in part, represent on this floor, never submitted a vote on her constitution. Her people never asked to come into this Union; and for a partisan, political purpose, which I will lay plainly before this House if I have the opportunity, Ohio was created a State, dragged into the Union, and her electoral vote was cast for Thomas Jefferson and aided his election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, how stands the Republican majority on this floor and how stands the Republican party of this country upon this question? The President of the United States, a fairly good Republican, in my estimation, recommends the passage of this bill; and how is he met? Why, the cry comes, "He is undertaking to force his views upon the House of Representatives; he is dictating," they say, "to the House of Representatives." Let us see. The House of Representatives, taking the initiative in the Fifty-eighth Congress, without a single suggestion from the President, by the action of a majority of its caucus and by the action of substantially the whole body on this floor, not only indorsed this rule but passed it and sent it over to the Senate, and what the President has done was just exactly what a good Republican might do, just the sort of an act a Republican always does; he came and followed the leadership of the Republican party and recommended that they again do what they had already done. So this House is the leader and the President is the efficient and valued follower.

That this is a party question can be easily recognized within the next hour and a half. Here is a question that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says ought to be passed upon by the deliberate judgment of every man. Well, I am one of the sort of Republicans who believe that the Republican party as a whole knows more than I know as an individual. That is one of the concessions that I make against my own greatness. [Laughter.] And the Republican party is actuated on this occasion to careful consideration of a fact. Every Democrat on this floor, without exception, will vote against this rule and against this bill; and you might as well try to get me to disregard the suggestion of "thin ice" on a skating pond or the red light of danger on the railroad track as to vote in favor of a proposition for which the solid Democracy of this House votes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, if it is not too long.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Wyoming will suspend. The Chair has difficulty in hearing what is taking place upon the floor, and it arises principally from conversation amongst the Members. The galleries seem to be observing the injunction of the Chair not to converse. It is up to the membership to say whether the membership desire to hear what is being said. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do; for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I simply wish to ask the gentleman if he did not vote with practically the solid Democratic side last week on a very important question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not. Practically the solid Democratic side voted with me. [Great laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Following the gentleman's illustrious example, we have their promise that they will follow us to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. And with "us" are the people of England who were represented by the "three tailors of Tooley street." Now, the difference between the condition the gentleman suggests and his condition is this: In the case of the Philippine tariff bill the Republican majority of this House had a bill reported by one of its great committees and made a public measure, not only by the action of the House itself, but by the recommendation of the President of the United States in his message, and giving an opportunity to the Democratic party to come in here and vote if they wanted to. Now, we offer the same opportunity to the Democratic party, and not one of them will vote with us, and unfortunately a few of our Republican friends will be found out on the mountain top, where the lost sheep which has been the subject of a beautiful hymn was found. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill which was passed the other day, the Philippine tariff bill, which the gentleman says was a Republican measure, was passed through this House by Democratic votes, was it not, and would have failed but for the Democratic vote? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; it would have failed by 7 votes. It would not have passed without Democratic votes, as I suggested at the time. I only regretted that any Democrat voted for it simply from a partisan standpoint, but from a personal good feeling toward the Democratic party I was glad to see some of them stray over into the reservation. I gladly make this correction to my remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the fact still remain, shown by the record of the roll call, that without the Democratic votes the bill would have failed?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am told that that is so. I don't care whether it is or not. I stand here to say frankly to the House that this is a party measure, and I am frank to say another thing. You let this rule be defeated to-day, gentlemen—it is a small matter, a very small matter apparently—and the control of this House passes absolutely into the hands of the Democracy on the other side of this Chamber. Can you afford to do that because somebody's gold mine or somebody's coal bank or somebody's railroad is interested in suppressing the taxgatherer in these Territories out there?

Mr. FINLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio if in the Fifty-seventh Congress he did not vote to admit the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico as States separately?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think I did. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think I did, but at that time my party had not made this decree. Now it has, and I am a Republican, and I do not propose to shift the leadership of this House to the handful of Democrats on the other side. [Applause on the Republican side.] And since that time the Republican party has distinctly acted in favor of this measure, and since that time I placed myself upon record—and the gentleman heard me a few days ago. I am not consistent with my record of that time, and if there is anything I am proud of, it is that I am never consistent two years at a time amid changing events such as we have. [Applause and laughter.] It is enough for me to know, and it ought to be enough for any Republican to know, that the responsibility of the passage of this bill, if it shall pass, does not rest upon me or him. He will not be selected as an individual to be assaulted and assailed, but the responsibility will rest upon the great party of this country, headed by the great President of the United States, that, after a full consideration, has decided that this is the proper thing to do. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that this rule may be adopted. Ample debate is provided for in the rule, ample opportunity for every man to set himself straight before the country, and the alternative is the defeat of the Republican party and chaos on the floor of this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I protest against the cunning effort upon the part of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to turn this into a partisan question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is an effort to make a mere question of partisanship out of the question of the permanent welfare of the population of two great Territories proposed to be made States. The gentleman says that there is an attempt "to shift the control of the House to the Democratic side." The statement is absolutely incorrect. The only thing we are trying to do is to shift the control and framing and molding of this bill to the House of Representatives [applause on the Democratic side]; to shift it out of the hands of the Committee on Rules into the hands of the House of Representatives, almost a two-thirds majority of which is Republican. Ah, Mr. Speaker, do not let the gentleman say that he is afraid of Democratic control. What he is afraid of is that the House may control itself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for a moment in which to reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio that I have been inconsistent in my attitude relating to the admission of these two Territories into the Union. It is scarcely necessary for me to discuss that matter now that the gentleman, after having accused me of inconsistency, makes a virtue of inconsistency himself. [Applause.] There is no opportunity at this time to lay before the House the reasons that actuated gentlemen in their action last winter on a measure similar to this. I did not approve it then any more than I approve it now; and I thank heaven that the opportunity has been given, as I hoped then it would be given, to place myself right on this question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman interrupted me with a question, and I would ask him now if he will allow me to interrupt him with a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does not the gentleman think he ought to be very thankful that he has discovered one virtue and has embraced it? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I did not catch the gentleman's inquiry, Mr. Speaker, and not having heard the gentleman's question I am unable to answer it.

Mr GROSVENOR. Oh, my question was, if the gentleman does not think he ought to be very thankful that he has been able during two years to find one virtue and to embrace that virtue? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I have discovered many virtues in the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], Mr. Speaker, and I regret his lack of virtue at this time in not being on the right side of this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those "misguided" individuals who have been so unfortunate as to meet the disapproval of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in opposing this rule. I suppose that I am one of the "lost sheep" that he refers to. I am one of the men who voted in the last Congress in favor of a similar rule and in favor of joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico. I have changed my position. I say to the gentleman from Ohio, who glories in his own inconsistency, although his friends are sometimes ashamed of it [laughter and applause], that I have changed my position simply because I have gone to the Territory of Arizona, have visited twenty of its cities, met thousands of its people, seen the school children and the women and the merchants and the bankers and the ministers, all of them wearing labels, "We are opposed to joint statehood." I voted for it in the last Congress because I believed that the people of that Territory wanted it. I shall vote against this rule in this Congress because I know from personal observation that the people of that Territory do not want it. What do you propose to do? You bring in a rule here binding together with rivets of steel two propositions, and entirely distinct, in this House, one joining Oklahoma and the Indian Territory in a single State—everybody for it in the Territories and in the Congress of the United States—and then you tie to that another proposition joining New Mexico and Arizona in a single State, in defiance of the sentiment of the people of Arizona, in defiance of the sentiment of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, and in defiance of the real sentiment of three-fourths of the Republicans on this side of the Chamber. [Applause.] You talk to us about politics. The gentleman says that we want to waive the question of politics. Not for one solitary moment do we want to waive the question of politics. We oppose this rule because it is an un-Republican measure. What do you do? Put two propositions together—one good, the other bad—like the old riders that you used to put on the appropriation bills until public sentiment stopped it. You put these two together, compelling the men who want to vote for the good measure to vote for the bad and try to pound it through this House under the party lash. Is that Republicanism? The Republican party is strong. Never was there such a majority as was cast for Theodore Roosevelt; not for many years such a majority has been here as in this Chamber to-day, but the Republican party has not been strong enough, it is not now strong enough, and it never will be strong enough to violate the principles of republican government. [Applause.] Why, do you know what caused the birth of the Republican party? It was born because an effort was made to force upon the Territories, in defiance of the sentiment of their people, the obnoxious institution of slavery. From that day to this the Republican party has stood for representative government, and you come in here with this rule in a Republican House and in the name of Republicanism propose to do, what? Take the people of Arizona, a hundred and fifty thousand, with their tens of millions of dollars of property, protesting through the press, from the pulpits, from the Catholic Church, from the Presbyterian Church, from every church, from every schoolhouse, from every business house, against this outrage. You will not permit the Members of this House to separate these propositions and put them squarely upon their own feet. Do you know what is being done? Every one of you know that the men who love the Speaker of this House as a brother, that the men who love and honor the President of the United States because he is honest and true, are being brought in here to vote for this rule against their convictions because of their love for the two men whom I have named. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will now yield some of his time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Mississippi to give me an opportunity to ask unanimous consent that I may have one minute.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman, or as much time as the gentleman may desire.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina, during the progress of my remarks, asked me if I did not vote for a bill of a similar character in the Fifty-seventh Congress. There are some things I can not always carry at my tongue's end, and I admitted that I might have done so. I always take it for granted, when a gentleman puts a question of that kind to me and appears to be looking down at a book in front of him, that he has the record and means to charge that I did so vote. [Laughter.] Now, I do not want to be interrupted, but I want to say to the gentleman I not only did not vote for the bill, but I voted against the bill and made a speech against the bill. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to somebody on his side?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi protests against the attempt, as he says, to make this a partisan measure. Mr. Speaker, the Republican party generally decides what they think is a partisan measure. We had this proposition before a Republican conference in the last Congress, and by a large majority of votes we decided upon the same course that we are pursuing to-day, and when we brought the rule into the House we had substantially the whole Republican majority voting in favor of that rule and in favor of the same action we are proposing to-day. Since then there has been an election. Gentlemen upon this side of the House, gentlemen who voted for that rule and that measure two years ago and who are to-day pursuing a different course, went before their constituents, and if there was any opposition among the constituents of any gentleman on this side of the Chamber to the course we pursued it was then the time to show it in the election which we had; but, Mr. Speaker, we come back here to-day with a Republican majority in this House larger than we ever had before, and that after taking just this action. Then we had a conference in this Congress, and a large majority vote decided again in favor of this action. If anything ever is a partisan question here, it would seem to me that after the action of two conferences on this side of the House we had come pretty near to making this a partisan question.

Why, Mr. Speaker, only a few weeks ago we had the spectacle of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LAMAR] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] complaining of the action of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in taking them off of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. And what was his excuse? Why, that the bill which he advocated was a party measure, and adopted by the party conference, and he was disciplining these gentlemen because they had seen fit to go a little beyond what the conference had said and vote an amendment foreign to the bill, that was not covered precisely by the terms of the resolution in the party conference. He is the last man in the world to advise this side of the House as to what is a partisan measure. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Gentlemen plead for justice for the people of Arizona. I believe in the greatest good to the greatest number. There are 100,000 people in Arizona, but there are 80,000,000 people in the balance of the United States. I plead for the rights of the 80,000,000 people; I plead for the rights of the 8,000,000 people in the State of New York, represented in the Senate of the United States by two Senators, and I am unwilling that the people of Arizona, with her 100,000 people, shall have an equal representation in the United States Senate. There is the great and glorious State of Washington, with a million of population. Shall we wait until they get a million and a half and have some future Congress give us two States of New Mexico and Arizona?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In case we voted down the previous question, could not this House, if it so desired, keep Arizona out of the Union?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly it could, and I trust it will so long as there is a majority on this side of the House. But the other day the gentleman was triumphantly prophesying that the majority would change to the other side in the next Congress. It may come some day. The providence of God may again inflict the Democratic party upon the United States. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] But when the time comes, one of the worst inflictions that can come to the United States is the admission of New Mexico and Arizona to suffrage and statehood, with four Democratic Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BEDE]. [Applause.]

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Speaker, I say first in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that if the Democratic party gets into power again it will not be because of the providence of God, but because of the mistakes of the leaders of the Republican party in this House. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] I arise to oppose this resolution, because it proposes political miscegenation by the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona. I oppose it because it is not a reasonable thing, and the people of the United States and the Republicans of this House stand for the reasonable thing. Let us vote separately upon these two questions—questions that are not germane to each other. If you had a bill in here for the admission of Oklahoma, the leaders would not let a Member on the other side introduce an amendment to let in Arizona or New Mexico. Then why not divide them now, and let us vote intelligently on measures that should be separated. [Applause.] The gentleman speaks of the Senators from New York. Most people are trying to forget them. [Great and long-continued laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman from Minnesota does know, or ought to know, that his remark is against the rule of the House and is against all parliamentary usage. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Republican Senators referred to and criticised Mr. HEARST over in the Senate yesterday; why can not the House permit the gentleman to refer to the Senators from New York here?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BEDE] yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; he did not.

Mr. BEDE. I only intended my reference in the kindliest manner. [Laughter.] But the treatment of the East toward that part of the United States west of the Mississippi is a mistaken one. They speak of us as the "woolly West." They have gotten so that they are like the girl from Kentucky that I heard of the other day, whose father was an old unreconstructed Confederate, who said she was 21 years old before she knew that "damned Yankee" was not one word. [Great laughter and applause.]

When they want to whip us into line and get something done here, they call up the great name of Theodore Roosevelt, but when they want to defeat something that he wishes to bring about, they call him (not Members of this House, but the great interests of the East) the "bronco statesman." [Laughter.] They heap contumely on him merely because he once lived in Dakota. I say to you that the territory west of the Mississippi is two and one-half times greater than the territory east of the Mississippi. When you admit Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexixco, there will be twenty-two States, with forty-four Senators, west of the Mississippi. East of the Mississippi we shall have twenty-six States, with fifty-two Senators. The territory east of the Mississippi must forever have a density of population three times as great as that west of that river in order not to exceed it in representation. Oh, they say that they fear Senators from the West. I do not. But they say, "You haven't folks enough out there." When did a Senator ever represent folks? [Great laughter and applause.] If that is the policy, why did you not begin twenty years ago? Why did you divide the Dakotas and give them four Senators? Why did you not make Montana and Idaho come in as one State? Why did you bring in these other States if your policy is now to unite Territories, as you are proposing to do with Arizona and New Mexico—Territories that were once together, but were divided because we could give better government to them separately than together.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEDE. I would like to have one or two minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BEDE. That will do. [Laughter.]

Why, we used to hear it said that New England was not fit to live in [laughter]; yet we have made that a great country. Even Governor Bradford, in his notes on the early settlement of that country, intimates that the Pilgrim Fathers themselves would not have landed in New England if they had not been seasick. [Great laughter.]

We have made a great country of New England, and we love every State of it; I would not strike down one of her Representatives in this House or the other; but we love the West too. We have heard it said that Minnesota, the two Dakotas, Nebraska, and Kansas were the Great American Desert; but that idea has been wiped out and they are now garden spots. As a boy I heard it asserted that you could never run a railroad through Minnesota with the thermometer 30° below zero, because the water would freeze in the boiler and the locomotive would go dead. [Laughter.] We have now a great State there and other great States have been made in the West, and I believe in a fair representation for this great country west of the Mississippi River.

But this bill proposes to unite these two Territories which are greater in area than Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois all combined. Take all this territory from Plymouth Rock to the Mississippi River and you still have a territory smaller than that which you now propose to make into one State by combining the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will consume some of his time.

The SPEAKER. There are seventeen minutes on each side remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I have not occupied more than sixteen or eighteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see in a moment. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Mississippi, the Chair finds, has seventeen minutes remaining and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has twenty-seven minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to consume some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, no Member of this House believes more sincerely than I do that Arizona and New Mexico ought not to be admitted into the Union either jointly or severally. Neither of them possesses the natural conditions that give assurance of its ability to maintain a permanent population of sufficient size to entitle it to be a State forever.

But, Mr. Speaker, our Government is a government by party and party responsibility, not a government by individuals or individual responsibility. Our Government as such has no policies. Its policies are the policies of the party in control of the Government. These policies are formulated and declared by national conventions or by the representatives of the party in control in the legislative and executive branches of the Government, and we must either stand or fall with the policies of our party. In this particular instance the representatives of the party now in control of the Government have declared in favor of the policy it is sought to be enforced by this rule, and although I differ individually with that policy and with the judgment of those who have framed it, nevertheless, as a member of the party in control of the Government, I bow to the judgment of the majority of my party associates, and will therefore support this resolution. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that there will be only one other speech on this side of the House, and therefore I ask him to occupy all of the remainder of his time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that any policy of this House has tended so much to impair its influence and power in legislation as the adoption of rules of this character. If we, as a part of the National Legislature, have lost effectiveness, it has been through the policy of gagging ourselves by rules of this kind. I have voted for them, and I will possibly vote for them again in the future, but I consider the question now before this House, the admission of States into the brotherhood of the Union, as the most transcendent question that can come before this body, and while I am willing to give up my convictions upon matters of detail, upon schedules, matters of purely party policy, or something of that character, I can not give up my convictions upon a proposition of this kind. I love and admire the Speaker of this House more than any other man in this Union. I love and admire the President of the United States as much as any President we have ever had. I would desire more than I can say to carry out their wishes, but I can not sink my conscience even to do that. Nor would either of them ask it. They would think less of me if I did so.

What is the question here? It is not the question of admitting these States now, but it is the question of saying to the people of Arizona and to the people of the United States that their rights and their claims shall not even be presented or considered on the floor of this House. If you adopt this rule, you might just as well vote on this bill without any further debate. This rule allows no amendment. Under it we can not even offer an amendment. Some gentleman suggested a moment ago that if this rule is adopted we can debate until 3 o'clock to-morrow, and every gentleman can set himself right before the country. I do not ask any time to set myself right before the country or my constituents on this proposition. [Applause.] I voted for this proposition two years ago. I admit it, but I did it under protest. I did it at the earnest solicitation, yea, pleading, of the leaders of this House. When I visited Arizona last spring and saw the people there and the splendid civilization that they have built up, I said, "I will not vote again to force these people into an unholy union, even to bring them into the Union of States against their wishes."

Gentlemen, shall we say that we are afraid of ourselves? That is what we say if we vote for this rule. If you can adopt this rule you can not reject any amendment that you are opposed to. You know that there are many on this side of the House who would like to vote for Oklahoma alone, but who don't like to vote against this rule. You are afraid of yourselves. This is a sorry spectacle for the country to gaze upon. They say the President of the United States is in favor of this proposition. The President of the United States has declared in favor of the admission of these States, but he has not declared for this rule. He never would declare for this rule. If he were on the floor of this House every element in his nature would protest against it. If I know him as I think I do, I venture to assert that he would oppose this rule with all the power that he possesses. If he would not, he is not the man that I take him to be, he is not the man that the country believes him to be. If he would not do it, then the words that he has uttered with reference to a "square deal" are as "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." [Applause.]

No; the President of the United States believes in independence of thought and independence of action. If there is any one thing that has endeared him to the people of this country, it is his sturdy adherence to what he believes to be fair and right. He believes in doing what is right. He believes in considering the claims of every section and of every class, and he would be the last man to endeavor to force these people into this unholy alliance, at least until they have a chance to be heard. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, it seems somewhat tragic to me that the day of my birth should have been selected as the one day in the year for the sacrifice of the people in whose devoted service I have spent most of my life. When I saw the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. TAWNEY] take the floor in favor of this rule, I was reminded of another and much more tragic scene:

> And Joab said to Amasa, Art thou in health, my brother? And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him.
> But Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand: so he smote him therewith in the fifth rib, and shed out his bowels to the ground.

[Applause.]

In the guise of friendship he gives us the most savage, the cruelest cut of all. Mr. Speaker, this is not a party question. If it is, it is time for any party, mine or yours, to hand down its scepter to other people. When the rights of a people can be made the shuttlecock of party rule, and when the great good heart of that Republican majority to-day, unhampered by your great power, unhampered by the President of the United States, would beat this bill four to one, yet men like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and other gentlemen arise and swing the party lash over the weak, but give no reason whatever for this outrageous proceeding except allegiance to party command. There was no caucus of the Republican party on this question. The pretense of a caucus was a fraud on new Members. Whenever the Republican party or mine can make the rights of men subservient to the mere party lash, then that party deserves to be beaten and will be beaten. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that he intended to have only one more argument on his side.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Rules, I could not honestly cast my vote in favor of reporting this rule. As a Member of the House I can not honestly support it. So far as the people who sent me here are concerned, they have interest in it only as the people of the Union in general have interest in it. It would make no difference in my political fortunes were I to vote for this rule or vote against it, were I to support the bill or oppose it .

I am one of those who believe that so far as politics are concerned, the great American people, when their attention is really awakened and when a great question is before them, like the skilled navigator, will take the great circle as the shortest route between two points. American politics, when the people are interested in politics, and they are when great questions are up, are not to find solutions on narrow lines or in btiter prejudices.

In my vision there is that picture which is portrayed by that inimitable artist, Mr. Berryman, in the Washington Post of this morning. Beautiful American Arizona at the window with a hatchet in her hand; the Mexican endeavoring to ascend the ladder and forcibly make her his own. I see Arizona, in her magnificent American citizenship, earnest in protest against this measure and the method of it, and without a solitary vote in this body or in the other. However others may view it, whatever others may do, the people of Arizona, the people of our own blood, the American citizenship of this land, whether in a Territory or in a State, so long as I may raise my voice, so long as I may cast my vote on any proposition, shall at least find one, whatever the fates may decree, who is American and not Mexican. These people differ in traditions, they differ in education, they differ in race, they differ in ambition, they differ in religious faith, they differ largely in everything, and yet you are to weld them together as one in this indissoluble Union of States.

You separated Arizona from New Mexico years and years ago because the people of these two Territories could be governed better in two Territories than in one. Let Arizona speak, let New Mexico speak, and if the people in either protest against it, in the name of God, in the spirit of American patriotism and justice, in the honor of American citizenship, for the sake of American manhood, for the sake of American womanhood, do not perpetrate this outrage. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if I have kept correct count, I have now eight minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right; the gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there has been more or less shifting on this question since it was first brought up in the Fifty-seventh Congress. At that time Mr. OVERSTREET, the gentleman from Indiana, introduced an amendment to the bill that was then pending providing for the formation of three States—that these two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico should be united as one State, and that was voted down by 108 noes to 28 ayes.

If the Members of this House could visit Arizona, they would soon realize that the jointure of that Territory with New Mexico would be wholly unjust to the citizens of the former Territory.

Mr. Speaker, during the past summer a number of Members of this House did go to Arizona and among them was my friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. He now urges us to stand by the Republican party. I remember when the gentleman was himself an insurgent in this House upon the Cuban reciprocity bill. I honored him for his stand at that time, and I honor him now for having taken that stand; but this is what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] said while he was in Arizona, when he was among those people, when he saw conditions in Arizona, and when he had an opportunity to personally observe the state of things in that Territory. I read from the San Francisco Examiner of October 16, 1905.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Mississippi to yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield the gentleman one-half minute.

Mr. KAHN. I read from that paper:

Representative TAWNEY, of Minnesota: "Were the Members of Congress to come here and see, I doubt if four-fifths who have voted for jointure would do so after the visit. I now know the conditions, and my next vote will meet with Arizona's approval."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from California, I will again say that what he has read in respect to my statement in Arizona, with the exception of my future vote, is true, and just what I said a moment ago on the merits of the proposition. I am not in favor of admission of either one of these Territories, but that I would ever vote one way or the other, no statement of the kind was ever made by me on the trip through Arizona.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi yields to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] four minutes and a half.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I have been consistently opposed to the admission of Arizona or New Mexico either as single or joint States ever since the proposition has been before Congress, and I desire to call the attention of the House and of gentlemen who are familiar with the amendment for joint statehood, which has been referred to in this debate, to the fact that the question of joint statehood was brought up in this House, not in good faith, but for the purpose of defeating single statehood, and many gentlemen on the floor know this fact. That was the purpose of the amendment at that time; the idea in bringing it up was to defeat single statehood. Now, if I were called upon to vote on either proposition—and I am opposed to both—before I would cast my vote for what I consider a crime against representative American people, that of coercing them to join two different classes of civilization in one State, I would vote for two single States. And I desire to refer, Mr. Speaker, to the political aspect of this proposition which has been referred to by our distinguished leader on the floor of the House. The argument has been made on this side of the House that if this were not done at this time, later we would have two States—Arizona and New Mexico—and four Democratic Senators. Now, I desire to call attention to a little history. I want the Members of this House to stop and think about that question. When the Dingley bill passed this House it went to the Senate and before the Finance Committee of that body. At that time, as we all know, the Senate was controlled by Democrats and Populists, or free-silver Republicans. The Finance Committee was composed of six Republicans, six Democrats, and Senator Jones of Nevada. That bill could not be moved or taken out of that committee without the vote of Senator Jones, and every amendment that he offered or proposed was accepted by that committee. What are the interests of New Mexico and Arizona? First, wool; second, mines, mining, and minerals, and third, fruits—all protected to the very highest extent under the Dingley tariff bill; and a distinguished Member of Congress from California said on one occasion that the Dingley tariff schedules fitted the West and the Pacific coast as a knit shirt does the human body; it touches every part. Now, how can Arizona or New Mexico ever be Democratic under any present conditions? A Democratic policy would take the bread and butter out of their mouths; it would destroy the protection on their mines, their minerals, their wool, and their fruit, and yet we are presented with the argument here that these States will be Democratic if they are admitted.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not further take up the time of the House, but I do want the Members on this floor to consider that proposition. Why, you might just as well go to Vermont and ask for Democratic Senators as to go to New Mexico and Arizona for them, if they should in the future have statehood.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to state the politics of the present Delegate from Arizona.

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand the present Delegate is a Democrat.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. How does it happen, if Arizona is as strongly Republican as Vermont, that the present Delegate is a Democrat?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would like to answer that in the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] will go to Arizona he will find that the present

Delegate is a man who has spent his life among those people, and as he goes from town to town everybody says, "Why, here is MARK—MARK SMITH." The gentleman's own personality brought him here, coupled with his position on this statehood matter. That is what elected him to Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then why was he beaten two years ago?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes; why was he beaten two years ago?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the time on this side is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. It is exhausted, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has twenty-three minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, for over fifty years the Territory of New Mexico has been knocking at the doors of Congress for admission into this Union, and when I say New Mexico, I mean both Arizona and New Mexico, because they were originally one, and they ought yet to be one. Fifty-three or fifty-four bills for the admission of New Mexico have been introduced into this House. Seventeen times one or the other branch of Congress has passed laws admitting New Mexico as a State into the Union.

Now, under those circumstances, the time has finally come when the two great parties of this country, the Democratic and the Republican parties, have decreed that these Territories should be admitted into the Union on some terms or other; and each of those parties has adopted a policy with respect to the manner in which they should be admitted. The Democratic party, in its platform at the last national convention, said:

> We favor the admission of the Territories of Oklahoma and Indian Territory. We also favor the immediate admission of Arizona and New Mexico as separate States.

Now, here is one thing upon which the two parties are agreed, and that is that the Territories shall be admitted, but they exercise a different judgment as to the manner in which they shall be admitted. The Democratic party says they shall be admitted as separate States with four Senators. The Republican party says they shall be admitted as the Territories originally stood, as one one State with two Senators. Why the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS] says he is pleading for representative government. He is pleading against representative government and against the theory of our Government as it was originally determined. Let me call your attention to some significant figures. There are fourteen States in this Union to-day that have twenty-eight Senators and only twenty-eight Representatives. There are six States in this Union to-day that have twelve Senators and only six Representatives. There are five States in this Union to-day that have ten Senators and ten Representatives, and if you admit Arizona and New Mexico as a single State you will have sixteen States with thirty-two Senators and thirty-two Representatives. I ask my friend if that is the representative government that was intended by the men who made the Constitution? There are east of the west line of Kansas 80,000,000 of people. There are west of the west line of Kansas 5,000,000 of people. I stand here to-day for the 80,000,000 as against the 5,000,000. [Applause.] My State has thirty-two Representatives in this body and their vote amounts to nothing in the Senate as against the votes of two Senators from Nevada that has not as much population—men, women, and children—as there are voters in my representative district.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he intends to hold upon this floor that Representatives of Western States are antagonistic in their purposes, in their desires, and in their work to eastern interests or any other?

Mr. DALZELL. I am not arguing that question. I am arguing that there is an undue number of Senators in the United States as compared with the Members of Congress at this end of the Capitol representing population, and that the whole system of Government as devised by the fathers has been overturned by the introduction of these Senators from these small States. Mr. Speaker, I am arguing that Senators ought to represent population, and not rocks and sand. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There have been a great many people from Pennsylvania who have gone westward. Does the gentleman contend there are no more going in the future?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I do not know what that has to do with this matter. Possibly the gentleman does.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, this is legislation for all time.

Mr. DALZELL. When those Territories are filled up with a sufficient population to be admitted as independent States in this Union the Congress that then exists will deal justly and fairly, I have no doubt, with the question. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is denied that this is a political proposition. Why, if this is not a political proposition then it is impossible to make any proposition political. In the Fifty-eighth Congress the Democratic party of this House met in caucus and passed a resolution against this proposition that we are now arguing for, and made it, so far as the Democratic party is concerned, a political proposition. Upon the other hand, in that same Congress—the Fifty-eighth Congress—the Republicans of this House, many of them Members of this present Congress, met in caucus or conference—I care not whether you call it caucus or conference, it amounts to the same thing. This is a Government by parties, and the only way for a party to govern is by an organization whereby the will of the majority my impress itself upon the minority——

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. MARSHALL. Was it not distinctly understood, before a single step was taken in this conference, that the Members were not to be bound by it?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, every solitary Republican Member, with two exceptions, who attended the conference to which I am referring in the Fifty-eighth Congress voted the Republican proposition in the House, and the gentleman who now interrupts me attended that conference and subsequently voted for this present proposition in the House.

Now, I say that the Democratic party, by a caucus, made this a party measure. I say that the Republican party, by a caucus, made it a party measure. But I do not stop there. On the 19th day of April, 1904, a rule was introduced into this House almost identical in terms with the rule that is now pending, and every solitary Republican Member of the Fifty-eighth Congress, with two exceptions, voted for that rule. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], who has recently taken his seat and who expressed himself with such bitterness against this measure, voted for that rule. Every Republican Member of this Congress that was a Member of the Fifty-eighth Congress, as I say, with two exceptions, voted for that rule. But that is not all. Every single Republican Member, with one exception, when the time came, voted for the passage of the bill. That is not all. That bill went over to the Senate. The Senate added a number of amendments, but the most prominent and conspicuous amendment was the one that carried out the views now advocated by the gentlemen on the other side of the House. A rule was brought into this House that took from the Committee on Territories the bill with the Senate amendments and sent that bill to a conference with a disagreement to all of those amendments, and every solitary Republican Member of this House voted for that rule.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the gentleman know that that bill went to the Committee on Territories, and they absolutely refused to bring it into this House until those who were opposed to it would agree to allow it to go to conference, and when it went to conference would not allow it to come out?

Mr. DALZELL. I know nothing of the kind.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. DALZELL. I know that the gentleman voted for the rule.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know, and I know the reason why.

Mr. DALZELL. How the gentleman's conscience may have been influenced is a question with him and not with me.

Now, in addition to that, there was a Republican conference at the present session of Congress. That conference was well attended. The gentlemen who are opposing this bill here to-day attended that conference.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that it is proper here to refer to what has occurred in conferences, or what may occur in the conferences, but inasmuch as the gentleman insists upon referring to it, if it would be proper for me to do so, I would like to inquire of him how many moments of that entire conference were given to the gentlemen opposing this bill?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not see the relevancy of the question. Any gentleman who would allow himself to be controlled upon a question of this kind by a matter of personal pique, either with respect to the time that he served in a conference or for any other personal reason, is unworthy, in my judgment, to sit in the House of Representatives. Now, I do not propose to be interrupted any more.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to inquire of the gentleman if he has reference to myself in what he has just said?

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is perfectly capable of understanding what I have said, and if he does not now, he can think about it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that this has been made a party measure by a Democratic caucus, by a Republican caucus, by three votes of Republicans on the floor of this House, and by a conference only recently held. It has been made a party measure by the President of the United States, who adopted in his last message the action of the Republican party in this House. And I say further that it is perfectly manifest from what has taken place here to-day that it is a party measure. Why, every gentleman on this side of the House who has arisen to speak against the rule has risen by the courtesy of the leader of the Democratic party. And every Republican on this side of the House who votes against this rule votes shoulder to shoulder with the Democratic party.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I had not yielded time to those gentlemen, would the gentleman from Pennsylvania have yielded it?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all; not a minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the gentleman is not going to blame me for permitting the representatives of the people to have opportunity to address the House? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. I am not blaming the gentleman at all. I am admiring his cunning. I am admiring his ingenuity as a party leader in surrendering his time, not to the Democrats, all of whom are lined up, but to Republicans whom he hopes to have follow his leadership.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not the keeper of any man's conscience, but it does seem to me that in a Government such as ours, where the government is purely a government by party, it is the duty of every member of a party upon a party measure to stand by his party; and I leave the subject just here. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 192, nays 165, answered "present" 3, not voting 26, as follows:

NOT VOTING—26.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of the Speaker was called, and he voted "yea."

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. CRUMPACKER with Mr. ZENOR.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware with Mr. BELL of Georgia.

Mr. CURTIS with Mr. LITTLE.

Mr. CROMER with Mr. PATTERSON of South Carolina.

On statehood:

Mr. GRAHAM with Mr. VAN DUZER.

Mr. HITT with Mr. HILL of Mississippi.

Mr. WHARTON with Mr. BYRD.

Mr. ANDRUS with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I voted; and I find that I am paired with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE]. I desire to withdraw my vote.

The name of Mr. CURTIS was called, and he voted "present."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, is it proper in this connection to announce that I have a telegram from the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. VAN DUZER], who reports that his absence was caused by a railroad wreck in which he was somewhat injured? I would like to state that as the reason for his absence.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the statement will go in the RECORD.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, would it now be in order to ask for a recapitulation of the vote?

The SPEAKER. The difference in the vote is 38. It is in the discretion of the Chair to order a recapitulation. Unless there is some reason to question the roll, it is not usual to order it when there is so great a disparity in the vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to have it recapitulated, if the Chair will exercise his discretion in that respect.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman is not satisfied or doubts the result, the roll will be recapitulated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not doubt the result, but there has been such confusion that I doubt the accuracy of some of the votes.

The SPEAKER. Well, on that suggestion the Clerk will recapitulate the vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not doubt the general result, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman doubts the accuracy.

The vote was recapitulated.

The SPEAKER. The previous question, as before announced, has been ordered, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in order to save the time of the House I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 188, nays 158, answered "present" 2, not voting 38, as follows:

YEAS—188.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of the Speaker, and he voted in the affirmative.

The Clerk resumed and completed the calling of the roll.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. COCKRAN.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey with Mr. SOUTHALL.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas with Mr. BROUSSARD.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS with Mr. SULLIVAN of New York.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is agreed to; and under the order the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, with Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

During the reading of the bill the following occurred:

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I can not see the object in reading a bill which there is no possible opportunity to amend. It seems to me like consuming the time of the House unnecessarily, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I think it can not be dispensed with, under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the opinion of the Chair, that under the order of the House the reading can not be dispensed with.

The Clerk proceeded and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the rule adopted by the House makes no provision for a division and control of the time, I ask unanimous consent that the time shall be equally divided between the Democratic and Republican sides of the House, and that the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MOON, shall control the time on that side, and that I be permitted to control the time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time for debate upon the pending bill shall be divided equally between those supporting and those opposing the measure, and that the time of those supporting the bill shall be under the control of the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. HAMILTON, and those opposing the bill under the control of the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MOON. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Michigan to ask that the time be divided between the Democratic side and the Republican side.

The CHAIRMAN. The request, as put by the Chair, was that it be divided between those who support the bill and those who oppose the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, it becomes my duty to attempt a review of the provisions of this bill. I desire at this time to occupy only a short time, and would be glad if I might finish what I have to say, by way of opening, in thirty minutes. To that end I will ask that I be permitted to proceed for a time, and then if inquiries shall suggest themselves I will endeavor to make response to them.

The Constitution provides that "New States may be admitted by Congress into the Union," but it nowhere prescribes the number or character of the people who shall constitute a proposed State.

No community, I take it, can claim admission into the partnership of States as a matter of absolute right, but whether a community shall be admitted into the partnership of States ought to depend on the national judgment as to whether the best interests of the Government will be subserved by such admission.

Lying between the thirty-first and thirty-seventh degrees of north latitude stretches an immense domain, bounded on the east by Arkansas and Missouri and on the west by California and Nevada, out of which it is proposed by this bill to create two States, provided the people living thereon shall so elect.

Out of that part of this immense domain, now known as Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, the one organized about fifteen years ago and the other still unorganized, it is proposed to create a State to be known as the "State of Oklahoma." These Territories—Oklahoma and the Indian Territory—are rich in corn, cotton, wheat, coal, gas, and oil, and their cities, staked out upon the level plain but a few years ago by a virile population, drawn from all parts of the Union, have sprung like magic into opulence and power, equipped with every device of energy and luxury. Indian names once synonyms of savage warfare have become the musical names of municipalities, of civilized progress, in which both Indians and white men are participating. [Applause.]

Oklahoma, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, is an area of 38,830 square miles, divided into 26 counties, with a population according to the last national census of 398,000, and that population has now probably increased to about 700,000. The Indian Territory has an area of 31,000 square miles, with a population of 392,000 by the last national census, which has now grown probably to a population of about 700,000.

These two Territories when combined as a State will make a State smaller than Kansas, smaller than Nebraska, smaller than South Dakota, and about the size of North Dakota. Gentlemen, the arguments in favor of statehood for Oklahoma and the Indian Territory are urgent and compelling. I take it there is hardly a man on the floor of this House who is opposed to statehood for Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, although some few would prefer to see those two Territories separately admitted.

One important provision I desire to call attention to before passing to a discussion of Arizona and New Mexico, and that is the provision whereby it is proposed to project Federal authority into the proposed State of Oklahoma by a requirement that the constitution of the proposed State shall compel prohibition for twenty-one years of the sale of intoxicating liquors within those parts of the proposed State now known as the Indian Territory and the Osage Nation and any Indian reservations which may have existed as such on the 1st day of January of this year.

The reason why this provision is sought to be incorporated in the constitution of the proposed State grows out of what the committee regards as our moral obligations to the Indians. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that our treaty relations with the Indians have almost ceased by their own limitations, and that such treaties as still exist will expire on the 4th day of March of this year; but our committee could not escape the view that there was a certain moral obligation incumbent upon the Federal Government to protect the Indian from himself. We do not doubt the legality of the proposition—we believe in the constitutionality of it.

Farther west lie the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, with their deserts shimmering in eternal sunshine, their mountains towering toward the sky, their canyons where daylight is twilight, their river valleys of inexhaustible fertility when touched by the magic of irrigation, their mines of inexhaustible wealth, their climate with health in every inspiration, their cities teeming with activity, and here and there the remnants and reminders of one of the oldest civilizations on the American continent. [Applause.]

Topographically the Territory of New Mexico has been called a part of the roof of the continent, sloping not only eastward and westward, but southward, from the eastern side of which the waters flow into the Atlantic and from the western side of which the waters flow into the Pacific.

The Territory is divided, according to the governor's last report, into three regions; one, the eastern plains, being an extension of the high plains of Texas; another, the valley of the Rio Grande, and the third, the western plateaus. In this valley of the Rio Grande and its tributary valleys two-thirds of all the population of New Mexico live, and in these valleys are to be found three-fourths of all the irrigable lands of the Territory of New Mexico.

Arizona is divided into two regions, one the high northern plateaus, where, from plateaus 5,000 to 7,500 feet above sea level, great mountain peaks and spurs and volcanic cones rise still higher. These plateaus farther south in Arizona become great mountain ranges, which grade off into low volcanic ridges; and these volcanic ridges farther southward descend, by a succession of mesas or table-lands, down to a great alkali desert, almost on a level with the sea. Arizona has an area of 113,000 square miles, or 73,000,000 acres. New Mexico has 122,580 square miles, or 78,000,000 acres. This makes a total area of 235,580 square miles, or 151,000,000 acres, and of all that vast area only about 1 per cent is irrigable. The governor of New Mexico in his last report, which I have here on my desk—and they claim a larger population than the last Federal census gives them—says that there are 300 acres of land down there to every person, and that only 1 acre out of the 300 is cultivated.

Arizona has a population of 123,000. I say 123,000. By the last Federal census it is a trifle less, between 122,000 and 123,000. Of this, 26,000 are Indians, and it is only fair to the people of Arizona to say that they claim a much larger population. They say that they have a population of from 140,000 to 170,000. New Mexico, by the last Federal census, has a population of 195,000. They also claim more. They also claim that the Federal census is inaccurate; and of that population of 195,000, there are about 16,000 Indians, if I remember correctly; but the Indians in New Mexico are the Pueblo Indians.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are certain powerful interests that are opposed to statehood for Arizona and New Mexico. Among these powerful interests which are opposed to the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as one State are the railroads of Arizona and New Mexico—and I do the railroads no injustice in supposing that in their opposition to statehood for Arizona and New Mexico they are animated, at least in part, by their financial relation to the situation. Supporting this supposition, permit me to call your attention to that part of the last report of the governor of Arizona, in relation to the assessment of railroads. He says, on page 19, as to the second class—that is, those railroads to which he has previously referred as being in part exempt from taxation:

> In the second class is the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad, extending across the Territory from east to west, a distance of 390.99 miles. This road constitutes a part of the transcontinental line of the Santa Fe. By an act of Congress it is provided that it shall pay to the Territorial treasurer the sum of $175 per mile in lieu and in full of all taxes leviable for Territorial or county purposes. This flat rate is arbitrary, and must in every instance be greater or less than the rule of equality would impose. At a 3 per cent rate of taxation (which is probably less than the actual rate) this would fix the valuation of one of, if not the most, valuable railroad lines in the Territory at $5,833.33 per mile. And this must be assumed to be a valuation fixed, inferentially, by Congress. It would seem, therefore, unequal to assess a railroad of no greater actual value at a higher rate, just as it destroys every notion of equality to assess arbitrarily 390.99 miles of a total of 1,837 miles at $5,833.33, or approximately that, and wholly exempt another 558 miles of the total mileage from any taxation. At best, if the railroads were the only property upon which taxes were to be levied, it would seem fair that those having no greater value than the one whose valuation is, inferentially, fixed at $5,833.33 per mile should not be assessed at a higher rate than that, and that roads of less real value should, for the purposes of taxation, be assessed at less than $5,833.33 per mile. But the railroads are not the only property upon which taxes are to be levied, and hence, if a valuation upon them is to be fixed at a proportionately lower rate than upon other taxable property, an inequality arises that is unjust to the owners of other property than railroads.

The difficulty is, Mr. Chairman, that this system of taxation—that is, the flat rate of $175 per mile per annum—is not applied equally to the whole Territory, as the governor complains. Now, in addition to this, there are railroads in Arizona estimated by the governor (on page 32 of his report) to be worth $10,312,380 exempt from taxation. To enable the House to form some idea of the condition of which the governor complains, permit me to call your attention to the fact that the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad north and east of Albuquerque, which is not part, I take it, of the exempt roads, is taxed on a valuation of $7,000 per mile. That part between Albuquerque and Rincon is taxed on a valuation of $6,500 per mile. That part west of Albuquerque is taxed $175 per mile per year. This tax of $175 per mile per year, the governor of Arizona says, would be on a valuation of a little over $5,000 per mile in Arizona, whereas in New Mexico this tax of $175 per mile per year, it is estimated, would be on a valuation of about $4,000 per mile. Some gentlemen may say, Now, how would this condition be cured if these two Territories were made into a State? This one suggestion ought to help—that that very same railroad, when it crosses the border line from Arizona into California, at the town of Needles, if I remember correctly, has a valuation fixed upon it by the State of California of $14,000 per mile, and by Census Bulletin No. 21, recently issued, it appears that these roads have a commercial value in the Territories of $39,000 per mile. Further, the Southern Pacific, when it crosses the line from New Mexico into Texas, at El Paso, has its valuation there raised by the State of Texas to $17,000 per mile. These facts to every fair-minded man ought to suggest some reason why these powerful interests are opposed to statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, and the act of Congress which provides that flat rate of $175 per mile per year says it shall continue so long as they shall continue to be Territories. Another interest——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield, certainly, for a question.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Whose fault is it that that act of Congress exists?

Mr. HAMILTON. I have not any defense to make for that act, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is one Republican act you do not defend?

Mr. HAMILTON. It ought to be plain to my friend that I am not defending that act.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then I want to ask you this question: Conceding there is corruption on the question of taxation in Arizona, and it is admitted that it is also in New Mexico by the Delegate——

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. How much better condition will they be in under joint statehood than under single statehood on this question?

Mr. HAMILTON. Certainly that is a a very proper inquiry. Just as soon as Arizona and New Mexico are joined in statehood, I take it, all the American citizenship of that Territory would immediately see the impropriety of taxing a railroad at the rate of $175 per mile per annum, when in California, just over the line, that same railroad was taxed at the rate of $14,000 per mile; when in Texas, just over the line, another railroad, taxed in the Territories at about $7,000 per mile, was taxed at the rate of $17,000 per mile [appaluse], and when the Census Bulletin shows that these roads have a commercial value of $39,000 per mile; and further, I take it that the gentleman from Tennessee will not dispute that American citizens, having the interest of the State at heart, desiring to have fair taxation of every industry, not desiring that other industries shall be discriminated against, will see to it that some fair system of taxation is substituted.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Tennessee concedes——

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am conceding something myself now.

Mr. HAMILTON. Good!

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Tennessee concedes that American citizens would do that and American citizens do that everywhere, and yet he wants to make the suggestion to the gentleman from Michigan that 90 per cent of the people of the present Territory of Arizona are American citizens and that the American Congress is composed of American citizens.

Why is it, then, that the Congress does not remedy it, if it is wrong? Why is it that the people of Arizona do not remedy it, if it is wrong? In other words, is not the gentleman from Michigan undertaking to present to this House a statement that is totally irrelevant to the question of joint statehood?

Mr. HAMILTON. Now, the gentleman has propounded a somewhat lengthy question.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Would Americans in the Territory do as well——

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not yield further now. Arizona as a Territory is permitting these improprieties. New Mexico as a Territory is permitting these improprieties. If, as it is hoped by my friend from Tennessee and his Democratic brethren, Arizona could come into the Union as a separate State, these same influences, which are very powerful in that Territory, would still continue to be very powerful in the proposed little State of Arizona, and the same influences, which are very powerful in the little Territory of New Mexico, would still be very powerful in the little State of New Mexico. But sometimes two poisons neutralize each other. Put these two Territories together and they will not pursue that course.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I desire to ask my friend one question now.

Mr. HAMILTON. I want to pursue this line further.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Corruption, the gentleman says, exists.

Mr. HAMILTON. I have not charged corruption, nor have I made one suggestion of it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. What does the gentleman charge there?

Mr. HAMILTON. I read the governor's report. I ask gentlemen to draw their inference as thinking gentlemen.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The only inferences an intelligent man can draw is that it means corruption. Let me ask the gentleman, if corruption exists in Arizona, where the population is 90 per cent American; if corruption exists in New Mexico, where the majority of the population is Mexican, then if you unite those two Territories will not the corruption have a better advantage in the control of one legislature and one governor than of two legislatures and two governors?

Mr. HAMILTON. Let me answer the gentleman. Under present conditions the Territory can not purge itself as well as a State can. [Applause.] The governor of a Territory is an appointive officer. He is not responsible to the electorate. Make the governor of Arizona and the governor of New Mexico responsible to the moral sentiment of the people and a different condition might prevail there. [Applause.] The governor of New Mexico—and I can not speak about Arizona—appoints a little coterie of officeholders—about 350 of them. That little coterie of officeholders go about the Territory of New Mexico. They owe their position to that appointive power. That makes a close corporation for the carrying along of any purpose which they desire to carry on as a Territory. Change that condition, give them a legislature, let the people be represented there, and I take it that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], unless he wants to reflect upon State government, will admit that those people ought to be able to regulate and change their condition, or else State government is a failure.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Just one suggestion there——

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman stated he would allow me to proceed.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will in one second. The logic of the gentleman's position is this: If the forces of corruption are united they become weaker.

Mr. HAMILTON. They are united now. [Applause.] I said that sometimes one poison neutralizes another.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But the corrupt poison——

Mr. HAMILTON. I made my position clear. Now, I want to call the attention of my friend, and he does not approve this any more than I do, to the mining interests, referred to on page 23 of the report of the governor of Arizona. The governor of the Territory, in his annual report, has taken occasion to call attention to the gross undervaluation of mines for purposes of taxation. Referring to the manner in which the law is disregarded by the local taxing officers, he says:

> It is conceded by estimates made by the most conservative experts that the mines of Arizona have not heretofore been assessed in the aggregate at 5 per cent of their value.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAMILTON. I can not yield now.

> At a recent meeting of the Territorial board of equalization (August 14–21, 1905) an attempt was made in the direction of remedying this palpable evil. So careless or ignorant in the discharge of their duties have been the local taxing officers that gross inequalities are found in the assessment of the mining properties. It would appear that because of this disregard of duty any step taken to rectify the inequality in the valuation of such properties may work hardships in individual cases. These cases, however, are not numerous. It is a usual result, where those charged with the administration of law are ignorant, habitually careless, or corrupt, that an attempt to return to a fair administration of it is temporarily followed by apparent hardships upon some.

Now, I would like to make a comment on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Michigan to request that he be informed when he had consumed thirty minutes of his time?

Mr. HAMILTON. I think perhaps I will try to proceed ten or fifteen minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. That is entirely under the control of the gentleman.

Mr. HAMILTON. I want to discuss this just a moment, and then I will give my friend from California a chance.

Now, this state of affairs as to mining assessments is not a matter solely of testimony before the committee. There is not any possible conflict of opinion. It is not one man's opinion against another man's opinion. It is a cold statement in type of the goveror of Arizona. The railroads in Arizona are valued for commercial purposes at about $68,000,000; they are valued for taxation at about $6,000,000; that is about 9 per cent. In New Mexico the railroads are valued at about $86,000,000, and valued for taxation at about $8,000,000, about 9 per cent of their value. The mines in Arizona—and there is where the principal mines are—are taxed at less than 5 per cent of their value.

Now, I could call your attention to specific instances which appeared before our committee, and in doing this I desire not to cast any reflection upon anybody. Take, for instance, the case of a gentleman who appeared before the committee—a Senator of the United States. The Senator, having waived his privilege as United States Senator, proceeded to make comment upon the governor's statement to which I have referred, and upon the statements made by the well-known newspaper correspondent, Mr. William E. Curtis, and of the equally well-known correspondent, Mr. Walter Wellman, as to the value of certain mines. It appeared that William E. Curtis had said that the owner of the mine told him that he had been offered $25,000,000 for his mine. The Senator said he had never been offered $25,000,000 for his mine, and that he did not make any such statement to Mr. Curtis. In that same connection I called his attention to the fact that Mr. Curtis said that there had already been taken out of that mine $90,000,000 worth of ore and that the annual income of that mine had been upward of $3,000,000, and that there was about $150,000,000 worth of ore in sight. The mines of Arizona are rich beyond the dreams of avarice.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. The gentleman need not look that way at me.

Mr. HAMILTON. I was trying to get some inspiration out of my friend. Well, now, that mine with an annual $3,000,000 output is valued for taxation at less than a million dollars. Now, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Do you not know that the assessors in Arizona and New Mexico are now elected by the people? Then what difference would there be under joint statehood?

Mr. HAMILTON. The governor says that these matters are regulated by a board of equalization.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Only the railroad property; but all other property is assessed by assessors elected by the people.

Mr. HAMILTON. My recollection is not in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from California.

Mr. NEEDHAM. You are mistaken.

Mr. HAMILTON. I simply ask my friend from California to draw that just inference which the governor's report permits to be drawn, and I do not care to discuss this subject any further.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Is not that inference drawn by nearly every governor of every State in the Union to-day?

Mr. HAMILTON. No; not every State. Here is an assessment of less than 5 per cent of the valuation of these mines, which are rich beyond conjecture.

Another great interest is said to be opposed to joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, the lumber interest. On page 23 the governor of Arizona says that this interest is very inadequately taxed. I do not care to make any further comment upon that.

Mr. SMITH of California. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of California. Are the taxing officers elected or appointed? Which is it, under the Territorial government?

Mr. McGUIRE. The assessors are elected, and in addition to the assessors there is a board of equalization which can either raise or lower taxes.

Mr. SMITH of California. I wanted to know whether we had to charge this condition of things to the people of the Territory or to the President of the United States, the appointing power.

Mr. HAMILTON. Charge it where you will, but look for your remedy——

Mr. SMITH of California. Now, if they are elected by the people will you change the nature of the people and therefore the nature of their public servants by transferring the form of government from a Territory to a State?

Mr. HAMILTON. I will ask the gentleman to study that board of equalization pretty carefully in connection with the governor's report. That is all I have to say about that.

The cattlemen are said to be opposed to joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, and this casts no reflection upon the cattlemen. One gentleman down there appeared before the committee. He had cattle on a thousand hills and more, and probably did not know how many cattle he has. The interests which he represents are opposed to joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico because of the disappearing public domain. These lands, intended for school purposes, for making one of the finest school systems of any State in the Union, would be set aside for that purpose and would no longer be free grazing ground for the gentlemen who own large herds of cattle.

I have commented upon the Territorial officers. Now, I want to hurry on. Objection is made because the systems of laws in the two Territories are inconsistent. Gentlemen, there is not a shadow of an argument to any fair mind, I take it, in that. They say there is a difference in the system of laws. New Mexico has one code of laws, Arizona has another code of laws; but witnesses before the committee stated that these laws were drawn from various States—California, Texas, and New York—and that they were practically drawn from the same sources, and that the Territory of Arizona is talking about adopting the sanitary laws of New Mexico. Their codes of laws are not inconsistent, but what difference? If they were made one State, they would get together and adopt a code of laws which would contain the best elements in both the old codes.

Ah, but they say the administration of the law in the courts would be difficult. Let us examine that. You gentlemen come from the different States of the Union. You know that the administration of State laws is by what we in Michigan call circuit courts. Some of you in other States call them district courts. From these courts an appeal lies to the supreme court of the State. Now all over these two Territories, after they are admitted to statehood, would be circuit courts responsive to the people living within those circuits. Is there any difficulty in such administration of laws any more than there would be difficulty in the administration of the laws by a circuit court in the city of Chicago, or in the city of New York, where the population is very largely mixed, and where there is a larger foreign element than there is in the Territory of New Mexico? Besides all that, when it comes to the Federal courts, we have made Arizona into a western district and New Mexico into an eastern district, added to the ninth Federal circuit.

They say that the school system would be injuriously affected. Gentlemen, follow me a moment. What is the school system? The school system of these Territories does not differ in any degree from the school system which prevails all over the United States of America. It is the same old common school system, the splendid old common school system that gave many and many a man who sits before me to-day the only chance he ever had in the world. It is the same old common school system down there. There is no difference between Arizona and New Mexico. Besides that, one Territory has as much school property as the other to put up against the other and make a splendid common school system. Further than that, we propose to give them 4 sections of land to help them. That arid land is not very valuable, but we are going to give them this land so that they will get along pretty well.

Now, they say the area and distance is a great objection to making a State of Arizona and New Mexico, because it will be such a large State. It will be about 26,000 square miles less in extent than Texas. Gentlemen, from Prescott to Santa Fe is about 420 miles in a straight line. From Phoenix to Santa Fe is about 420 miles. From Sacramento to San Diego, Cal., is about 540 miles. When you talk about distance, look at the distance from Austin, Tex., to El Paso, about 580 miles. From Austin, Tex., to the north line of Texas is about 540 miles. I have a large number of comparisons here to show that the argument of distance ceases to be of any force on this question. Of course you see it will be large. Why, gentlemen, if area makes a State, the Desert of Sahara would long ago have been a great state in North Africa. But area does not make a State. The irrigable land down there is about a million and a half acres in both Territories. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has in his district 3,780,480 acres of land. Talk about size. Why, we have in the Fourth district of Michigan 2,309,120 acres of land.

Now, they say that there are barriers here—insuperable barriers to the joint statehood of Arizona and New Mexico. There is no natural barrier. What is it? None. The great Continental Divide is about 100 miles east of the imaginary dividing line. What is it? My friend Mr. Rodey—and I want to pay a tribute to Mr. Rodey, now that I have got along to him—no better Delegate ever came from any Territory to Congress [applause], and he worked to the best of his ability for joint statehood, and now he is back here hoping to see this thing go through. He told me that that so-called "Continental Divide," which has been raised up in the fertile imagination of some gentlemen here, is nothing but a hump, graded up on one side and down on the other, four railroads crossing it back and forth. He says the valley of the Rio Grande is 5,000 feet above the sea level, and when you talk about divides, there is a divide at Raton, on the Santa Fe route, and one at Glorietta, but there is no difficult divide between New Mexico and Arizona. There are two important divides in Arizona.

Now, they say it is difficult to get about these Territories. Of course it is difficult to get about from one place to another, and it will be difficult until they get more railroads.

They say there are people in New Mexico who are extracted from the Spanish, who speak partly Spanish. How many? Some people say two-fifths of the population, which is 195,000 by the last census, and that would be about 70,000—but say one-half of the people of New Mexico are of Spanish descent. As a matter of fact these people, as a rule, are God-fearing, church-going, upright, honest people, belonging to the Catholic Church, of good morals, and I understand, as a rule, they vote the Republican ticket. [Laughter.]

Mr. KLEPPER. And let me say to the gentleman that one-half of them speak English.

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes; and as my friend from Missouri says, one-half of them speak English.

But they say that the lesser population of Arizona fears merger with the greater population of New Mexico because of this population in New Mexico of Spanish extraction. Why, suppose half of the population of New Mexico were people of Spanish extraction. Suppose you had 100,000 Americans in New Mexico and 100,000 Americans in Arizona and there were 100,000 other people in New Mexico who were extracted from Spanish blood, somewhat remotely—three hundred years ago—that would be two to one on the count, would it not? Ah, but they say, "When you get a constitutional convention they will make their power felt there." Let us see about that. We provide for 66 delegates to a constitutional convention from New Mexico. We provide for 44 delegates to a constitutional convention from Arizona. Divide your 66 delegates from New Mexico and say that there are 33 of those reputable, respectable people who have the misfortune to speak two languages at least—which is more than a good many of us can speak—say that there are 33 of them out of the 66; well, add to your 33 Americans the 44 from Arizona, and you have 77. There you have it—77 to 33. Now, who has cause to be afraid there? What becomes of that bugaboo? Why, gentlemen, these people of Spanish extraction in New Mexico have demonstrated their loyalty and patriotism to this great Union of which they seek to be more intimately a part. From the Territory of New Mexico, a large percentage of whom were these same people, were drawn 6,500 men in the late civil war, and those men fought on the side of the Union; and in the late Spanish war, of those people 1,000 were recruited, and 500 of them were rough riders, who went, some of them, to war against the very nation from which they are extracted. In Arizona they have set up a monument to Bucky O'Neill, who died at San Juan Hill. Ah, if it had not been for the patriotism of people like that we might, indeed, possibly have been reduced to the condition somewhere described by Mr. Dooley, where travelers on the way to China would be getting up and looking over the side of the ship and saying, "There is where America used to be."

Now, because of the patriotism of people like that, we have become forty-five indestructible States in an indestructible union of States, united under one written Constitution, symbolized by one flag, known and respected the whole world over as the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.] And, Mr. Chairman, we hope to add two more stars to that flag, one to be known as the State of Oklahoma and the other to be known as the State of Arizona. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in this debate until morning, and I am not as fully prepared as I had hoped to be to present what few facts occur to me might contribute interest to this discussion, and yet when I reflect upon it the whole subject appears somewhat in the nature of satire to me. I do not think any gentleman who will address this committee on this subject entertains the slightest hope that a single vote will be changed by any character of argument that may be made. After the passage of the rule adopted by the House to-day, it becomes perfectly manifest that it is not a question of facts or figures; it is not a question, Mr. Chairman, of right or wrong. It has been boldly stated upon the floor of this House in the discussion of the adoption of the rule that the rights of these people are not to be considered, that the interests of this country are not to be considered, that these things must all be subordinated to party expediency of the hour, and it is that proposition alone which it is conceded actuates the majority of this House in the adoption of the rule by which we are forbidden to offer an amendment to this bill or to discuss it as it should properly be discussed. The hurried reading of the measure before the committee is the only one, permit me to say, that has been had or will be had either in this House or in the committee that had this measure under consideration. When the committee that had this bill in charge met for its consideration, I think it proper that this House should know that we were informed by the chairman and other Republican members of the subcommittee that they had met together previous to the meeting of the whole committee and had agreed upon every line and word of that measure, that every "i" had been dotted, every "t" had been crossed, and that every amendment which might be offered by the minority or anybody else relating to any subject involved in this bill would be promptly voted down. I want the country to know, Mr. Chairman, that in that committee we did what we were not permitted to do in this House. We offered to compromise our views upon this subject by separating these two propositions, and offered to amend the bill so as to submit to this House the question as to whether Oklahoma and Indian Territory should come into the Union as an independent State, striking out that part of the bill which related to Arizona and New Mexico. Not being satisfied with that, intending to go to the very farthest limits in justice to the people of Arizona, we offered to insert the word "each" in the bill at the proper place, which would leave to the people of Arizona and New Mexico the right to say whether they would accept the character of government that it is proposed shall be forced upon them now. The gentlemen promptly voted it down. We are not permitted to ask the consideration of the House of that subject.

I listened with great pleasure and interest to the chairman of the committee who has this bill in charge. I was in hope that he would assign some reason why Arizona and New Mexico should be combined in this unwilling union. Let us look at this matter as it appears to this House for a few minutes. On the one hand, here is Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, either one of them measuring up, in my humble judgment, to the highest standard of statehood; either one of them entitled to come into this Union on an equal footing with any other State in the Union; either of them with more taxable wealth, with more population, more area than dozens of Territories had when they were admitted to the sisterhood of States, entitled to admission by every rule that has ever been prescribed by Congress in the one hundred and twenty years since a Territory was first admitted into this Union as a State.

Many of us insist, Mr. Chairman, that they should be admitted as separate States now; but conceding that the people down in that country are the best judges of their interests, or at least have more at stake upon the proper solution of the question than others, and realizing that they are suffering from the form of government that obtains, we are willing to make that concession, and there is not a man upon this side of the Chamber, so far as my information goes, but who is ready and willing to step up here and join the other side of the House and make a State in twenty-four hours from Oklahoma and Indian Territory. Show me the man, Mr. Chairman, who has lifted his voice in this House in opposition to that proposition. Will the chairman of the committee having in charge this bill, will anybody deny that Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, under the conditions provided in this bill, are not entitled to be admitted now as a State in this Union? That being true, why is it not promptly done? Why are we standing here to-day in opposition to this measure? On the other hand, here is Arizona, through her Delegate, pleading simply to be let alone, begging the Congress of the United States not to destroy her original boundaries, not to join her forever in an unwilling union with her neighbor, New Mexico.

New Mexico is here to-day telling us through her Delegate that they are not anxious to be joined with Arizona. They claim that they have the right to statehood upon their own merits. This is also claimed, and justly claimed, in my judgment, in behalf of Arizona. The gentleman who preceded me referred in complimentary terms to the former Delegate from Arizona. I concur in everything he said complimentary to that gentleman, but I can not but mention the fact that when a similar measure was pending for consideration before the Committee on Territories two years ago the gentleman was then an earnest and ardent advocate of single statehood for New Mexico, and convinced me then that New Mexico should be made a State of this Union and made a State upon her own individual merits; and when the gentleman pictured to us the great Continental Divide that made an impassable barrier between those two Territories and told us that it would be impossible ever to adjust their different conditions and to communicate to that extent and with that ease that was necessary to carry on a proper State government and gave many and various other reasons why they could never be joined and why the Territory of New Mexico should be made a separate State, I listened to him with interest, and I became thoroughly convinced of the correctness of his views. He added to that argument another before the committee of the Senate, and I think I quote him correctly when he said before that committee that if the proposition were left to the people of New Mexico as to whether they should be joined with Arizona at this time it would be promptly voted down, and he said they would never surrender their views unless coerced by the unjust action of Congress. I stand upon what he said, Mr. Chairman, and insist it is the unjust action of Congress that is coercing the people of New Mexico into surrendering their views upon this subject. [Applause.] It is a species of powerful coercion, Mr. Chairman, and let me go a step further and say not only I feel absolutely sure, having learned from association with people in that section and what I have learned before the committees that have investigated this matter, that if the proposition were put to the people to-day in Oklahoma and Indian Territory as to whether they should have statehood as one State or as two, if we would just simply say,

"Now, you can have either one you want, it is not a question of what party is in power or what party is not, we leave it to you," three-fourths of the people of those Territories will say that they should have a single State of each Territory. They have been coerced into this position—coerced by the unjust action of this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman at some length went on to show that the railroads and mining interests, the lumbering interests, and the various other great interests in Arizona and New Mexico were not properly taxed. That may or it may not be true. I am inclined to believe that it is true, that it is there as it is elsewhere, that these institutions and industries, great and powerful as they are there, often escape their just portion of the burdens of civil government, and I thought when the gentleman took up that phase of the subject that he would certainly assign to this House some reason why it was necessary to force a union of New Mexico and Arizona in order to remedy that condition. I heard from him that they were not properly taxed. I heard from him for the first time also, Mr. Chairman, that the railroads of this country were opposed to joint statehood. I should like for the gentleman to tell me upon what authority he bases that statement. I heard him say that the mining interest is opposed to joint statehood; that the lumbering interest is opposed to joint statehood, and the only reason he assigned was that they escaped their share of taxation. I have no doubt they are opposed to statehood—opposed to statehood in any form—and they know there is no better way to defeat statehood legislation than by means and under the guise of this omnibus bill. In this form, in order to secure even a partial recognition of the rights of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, we must trample the rights of New Mexico and Arizona ruthlessly under our feet and turn deaf ears to the piteous appeal that comes to us from every village and hamlet and hill and plain in Arizona.

I attended the committee when they had the hearings upon this subject closely, I think, and it escaped my memory if any man said that the railroads were opposed to joint statehood or that the mining interests were opposed to joint statehood, or any of these other interests to which the gentleman has referred. The gentleman may correct me if it is not true. This is the first time that I have ever heard that proposition stated in that way. I have always understood they were opposed to any statehood legislation.

Mr. HAMILTON. Has the gentleman not heard that the railroads are opposed to joint statehood?

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, there is just the point. They are opposed, perhaps, to statehood. I do not blame them, if they are not taxed any more than it is said they are taxed; but who said they were opposed to joint statehood?

Mr. HAMILTON. May I suggest to the gentleman that the railroad is not an eleemosynary corporation, and that when it sends a train of cars down into the Territory, furnishing transportation, it will be an inference from which one might suppose that they were opposed to statehood?

Mr. REID. When they did what?

Mr. HAMILTON. They are not eleemosynary corporations.

Mr. REID. I have never heard of them being accused of being eleemosynary corporations. I do not understand the force or relevancy of the gentleman's remark, Mr. Chairman. My statement is that no such proof as that was made before the committee. I do not know whether they are opposed to joint statehood or single statehood. I assume, if what he says is true, they would oppose statehood under any circumstances. But it occurs to me that if they were compelled to make any concession whatever that these powerful institutions to which he refers, these railroads and the mining interests that take legislative bodies by the throat and direct them as they will, they would much prefer to have one legislature down somewhere in the mountains, from five to seven hundred miles to the farthest end of its jurisdiction, to deal with than two legislatures composed of such people as constitute the population of Arizona and New Mexico. [Applause.]

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. It is only in the Territory of Arizona that they have mining. It would hardly apply, as all mines are in that Territory. They do not have to deal now with two legislatures.

Mr. REID. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. There are mining interests in both Territories, and they would have two legislatures. The railroads are not all in the Territory of Arizona, and it is railroads that constitute a large per cent of the taxable wealth that, I understand, is escaping its just part of taxation.

Mr. KLEPPER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he remembers any evidence to the effect that the cattle barons of Arizona are opposed to joint statehood?

Mr. REID. I do not know. There was no such evidence before the committee when I was present.

Mr. HAMILTON. A gentleman by the name of Sturgis appeared, representing the cattlemen of Arizona.

Mr. REID. Perhaps I was not present when that occurred. I remember that the chairman made a remark once there that the cattle barons were opposed to statehood, but they have been keeping very quiet about it if they are opposed to joint statehood, Mr. Chairman, and that is all the more reason that they ought to have statehood. If these railroad corporations and mining interests and these great cattle barons are all doing what they can to prevent statehood, it is all the more reason why we ought to have statehood. We are here to agree with you that Arizona and New Mexico ought to be incorporated into the Union. The only question upon which we divide is as to whether they ought to come in here as separate States or to come in as one State. Now, I undertake to say if there has ever been any test prescribed in all the history of this country by which a Territory is entitled to admission into the Union that either of these Territories measures up fully to that standard.

What does it take to constitute a State? Is there any rule, any test, any standard by which we are to be governed, or any precedent which we are under legal or moral obligation to observe? Are we to give these people and the nation to understand that the destiny of these Territories depends not upon any question of right and wrong, not upon population, wealth, resources, and extent of area, but, spurning the jewel of consistency, as boldly stated by the gentleman from Ohio, the whole matter is to be determined by the political whim of the leaders of this House?

Let us test their sincerity. Take Oklahoma and Indian Territory. The people there are pleading for the "home rule" you proudly promised them in your party platform. They point you to their wonderful industrial development and inexhaustible resources, to their teeming hordes of population and immigrants streaming across their borders. They challenge a comparison with their sister States wearing the purple robe of sovereignty and demand to know why this great reward of the industry and courage and thrift of the American people is so long and so unjustly withheld from them. You promised them statehood. You can not deny that they are entitled to it. Let these people make no mistake as to who are their friends. You put us to the alternative of perpetrating an awful and an eternal outrage upon Arizona and New Mexico or still further deny to Oklahoma and Indian Territory the rights that are justly theirs. This is the miserable game you have always played; this is the insidious means by which you have succeeded in so far defeating all legislation whatever upon this subject. On behalf of these unfortunate people we have conceded everything but their political existence; offered to compromise everything but honor. There are many vicious things of a minor importance hidden between the lines of this bill, but we have no power to strike out. There are many things that should be added and inserted, conducive to the peaceful and proper organization of the States, but we have no power to amend.

No argument has ever been made why these Territories should be consolidated that does not apply with much greater force, if force there be in it, to the case of numbers of the Eastern States. Surely if Oklahoma and Indian Territory or Arizona and New Mexico should be made one State, then Delaware and New Jersey, New Hampshire and Vermont, Rhode Island and Connecticut should be made one. Has the country ever suffered on account of the fact that States were made of these small areas? And what are your reasons for consolidating the Territories? I confess that I have never heard a sound one advanced. In the case of Oklahoma and Indian Territory it is insisted that different resources exist in the two; that one has many things that go to make up material excellence that the other does not possess; that one is the complement of the other, and they should therefore be made one. But gentlemen forget that in the next breath they argue that Arizona and New Mexico are alike; that their material wealth is the same; that their people are engaged in similar pursuits, and should therefore be governed under the same code of laws.

In the early history of this country Territories organized themselves into States, came to the doors of Congress, presented their constitution, and demanded and received recognition as a sovereign State without any enabling act of Congress, and none is necessary to-day. Refuse to recognize them, if you will, but these communities to-day are, and of right ought to be, sovereign and independent States.

Thirteen States have been admitted to the Union with less taxable wealth than either Arizona or New Mexico. Oklahoma alone has more wealth than was possessed by any State when it was admitted to the Union. The proposed State of Oklahoma has 200,000 more people than any State had when it was admitted, and she has more school children than many States to-day have population. Under the ordinance of 1787, which I insist is to-day an implied contract, in good faith, binding upon the Union, and these people in all these Territories have the right to make its terms in their behalf, 60,000 free inhabitants was all that was necessary. Nothing was said about area, whether small or large, or wealth and resources, whether great or small. But you say the ratio of representation has increased. I deny that this has ever been made the test. Twenty-five States were admitted, beginning with Vermont in 1791 and coming on down to Colorado in 1876, and Maine and Kansas were the only ones that had 100,000 people. From 1836 to 1837 the ratio of representation was 47,700. Arkansas was admitted with 25,000 people, and let me call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that his own State came in, and came in as a matter of right, with only 31,000 people.

From 1845 to 1848, when the ratio was 70,600, Florida was admitted with only 28,700, Iowa with 43,000, and Wisconsin with 30,000. In 1858, with a census ratio of 93,500, Minnesota came in with 7,000 and Oregon with 13,200. With a ratio of 127,000 Nebraska came in with 28,800 and Colorado with 39,000.

The secret of the whole matter is the growing influence of the West in the Senate of the United States. If these Territories were east of the mountains they would have been admitted years ago. Gentlemen cry out in alarm at the prospect of granting to these Territories the same representation upon the floor of the Senate that is enjoyed by the older States. "What," they ask, "Is Arizona or Oklahoma to have the same power and influence in the Senate that is exercised by the great States of New York and Pennsylvania?" Why do they never compare these Territories with Connecticut and Rhode Island? Why do we hear nothing of the wonderful resources of Vermont, the multiplying populations of Maine and Massachusetts, or the boundless domain of Delaware? Ah, no, indeed! From the foundation of this Government New England has dictated the financial and fiscal policy of this nation, but the day of western ascendency has begun to dawn. The ability to sustain great populations in New England is rapidly diminishing, while that of the South and West is becoming greater and greater as year is added unto year.

There is more than twice as much territory west of the Mississippi as there is east of that river. The population east has increased in the last decade at about 17 per cent, while that west has increased at from 60 to 70 per cent. Fifty years from now, if the same ratio prevails, there will be three times as many people west as there are east of the Mississippi. The same per cent, and greater, holds true in regard to material development.

The two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico have more acreage in lumber than the area of the New England States. Arizona alone has more cattle and sheep than New England. This extraordinary development is true in every department of industrial life.

But, be it understood, that while I view the grand progress and development of my own section with all of the pride of a patriot, I take no pleasure in the declining glories of New England. I love every foot of her historic soil and all that is grand and glorious in her mighty past. I am proud to trace my own ancestry back to her sturdy loins. It is not that she is less, but that in the West there has grown up a greater. God has prospered the fortunes of her sons and daughters sent forth to take the land and subdue it. The son has grown greater than the sire. Mr. Chairman, the West has won her way to the position of power and influence in the nation that she demands shall be hers. It is unjust to withhold it from her. East of the Mississippi there are 26 States, with 52 representatives in the United States Senate. If all the remaining Territories were made into States there would be 23 States with 46 Senators west of the Mississippi, representing in the comparatively near future three times as many people.

But arguments do not avail. It is vain to repeat them here. Everything must give way to the politics of the hour. Your determination is taken. Go on and pass your bill, but let it be recorded that I am one among those who will not sell their birthright for a mess of pottage. When that day shall come, as come it will if this measure is enacted into law, when the populations of the South and West, far outnumbering the East, shall cry in vain for just recognition in the legislation of the nation; when their industrial development is hampered and made to pay tribute to less populous sections; when they demand their share of appropriations for public buildings and for rivers and harbors, let them turn back and read the history of this hour and determine who among us had the real interest of the whole country at heart. Let them say who it was that laid sacrilegious hand upon the covenant of our fathers and destroyed that equilibrium of power among the States represented in the Senate which they considered so necessary for the peace and perpetuity of this Union. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee proceed?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I know that the usual hour for adjournment has arrived, but inasmuch as this debate is so very limited under the rule, and advantage was taken of reading the bill, which occupied a great deal of time, I think we had better go along a little later. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, not in recent years has this country witnessed a more disgusting spectacle of "bossism" than has been displayed in this controversy over the admission of these Territories into the Union of States, and in no instance has this House shown more signally into what depths of degradation it has sunk. I do not believe it is an exaggeration to say that if every Member here followed his own judgment and observed the behests of his own conscience there would not be fifty votes in favor of this measure. But they have not been permitted to do this.

The Speakership of the House of Representatives has always been a position of honor and of power. Under the system of rules prevailing now he is vested with autocratic power. Blind when he does not want to see, deaf when he does not want to hear, he is the great joss of this House before whom every member of the majority must daily prostrate himself or risk political excommunication. The Committee on Territories held this bill for thirty days awaiting the order of its master to report it. For thirty days the Speaker of this House concentrated his energies upon the insurgents of his own party. He wheedled and coaxed them; he flattered and frightened them; he cooed like a dove and roared like a lion, as occasion required. He pointed out green political pastures for those who would sacrifice conviction to be servile, and pictured the dark waters of political oblivion sweeping over those whose independence was above price.

The Speaker was not alone in this crusade. Under the Constitution the President is vested with the duty to "give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." This the President did at the beginning of this Congress. There the duty of the President ended. But this did not mark the limit of Presidential activity. According to press reports, he has directed the campaign in this House; he has had the little coterie that through him control this House in frequent consultation, and anointed them anew with the oil of Presidential approval. From the same high authority it is known that he has summoned the "insurrectos" into his awful presence, singly and by squads. He has appealed to every sentiment of selfishness, every instinct of pride, every phase of partisanship, and every element of fear. The demand seems to have been, "Surrender your principles or surrender your 'pie.'" To appreciate the seriousness of this choice to Republicans it is necessary to know their childlike fondness for "pie."

By these methods a sufficient number of insurgents were chloroformed into silence or cudgeled into obedience to make sure of the adoption of this iniquitous rule under which the voice of this House is stifled and its true will thwarted. When this was assured the bosses passed the word down to the Committee on Territories, and, in servile obedience that would be amusing were it not so shameful, this bill was reported.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill reveals so completely the shameless hypocrisy of the Republican party that this country would be startled if it were not for the fact that the country has grown accustomed to this phase of its character. For twenty years it has been demanding through its national platforms just precisely what it is now seeking to defeat, viz, separate statehood for New Mexico and Arizona. In the convention of 1888 Mr. McKinley was chairman of its committee on resolutions and reported to the convention and secured the adoption of a platform containing this language:

> The Republican party pledges itself to do all in its power to facilitate the admission of the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Idaho, and Arizona to the enjoyment of self-government as States, such of them as are now qualified as soon as possible, and the others as soon as they may become so.

If it be said that as to New Mexico and Arizona this was only a pledge for statehood for the future upon their becoming qualified therefor, I call attention to the fact that prior to that time Republicans had passed bills through one or the other branches of Congress granting statehood to both New Mexico and Arizona. Between 1888 and 1892 Wyoming and Idaho had been admitted to statehood. At the Republican convention of 1892 the platform contained the following declaration:

We favor the admission of the remaining Territories at the earliest practicable day, having due regard to the interests of the people of the Territories and of the United States.

In 1896 Mr. McKinley was nominated and was declared elected. The platform upon which he ran repeated the language of the platform of 1892 upon this subject.

In all these platforms the declarations quoted were understood by Republicans and Democrats alike to mean that these conventions were declaring in favor of the admission of the Territories to separate statehood.

In 1896 Mr. FORAKER, now Senator from the State of Ohio, was chairman of the committee on resolutions and chairman of the subcommittee that drafted the platform. Speaking in the Senate on January 15, 1903, on the statehood bill, he said:

It was my fortune to be not only a member of the committee on resolutions in the national Republican convention of 1896, but I was also chairman of that committee, and I was a member of the subcommittee and chairman of the subcommittee that drafted that platform. I knew then exactly what we were putting in that platform. We put it in after giving a hearing to everybody who wanted to be heard; we put it in there thinking it would strengthen the cause of Republicanism throughout the West. It was not an idle thing; it was not an ill-considered thing on the part of those who did it; it was carefully considered, and it was done after it was thoroughly discussed. * * *

I can understand how a man might think, even in 1896 or in 1900, that these Territories ought to be admitted to statehood and might now think differently, but before any man has a right to change his mind he must profess to have new light of some kind or other. I have no new light. I was in earnest then. I knew what I was doing, and every other member of that committee knew what he was doing. There was a careful hearing. That declaration was not put in there to help the opposition—it was put in there to help the Republican party; and we put it in there because we thought it was right. I feel to-day just as I did then, and I intend to vote now, when it is not a mere platform proposition, as I voted then, because I am in earnest now, as I was then.

But the platform of 1900 settled beyond all controversy the position of the Republican party upon this question. The convention at which this platform was adopted nominated Mr. McKinley for a second term and nominated Mr. Roosevelt for the Vice-Presidency. This platform made this declaration:

We favor home rule for, and the early admission to statehood of, the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma.

Speaking of this declaration, Senator FORAKER, in the speech referred to before, says:

I supposed it was a settled proposition when we came out of the national Republican convention of 1900 that the Republican party of this country proposed to do what we had promised to do—to bring these Territories into statehood. I suppose we had so settled it. I have been in favor of the unqualified admission of these Territories from that time until now. I helped draft that declaration and I helped to secure its adoption. Without new light I could not repudiate it now, and, Mr. President, I have had no light except only that which has strengthened me in the belief that I was right then and that I am in the right now.

Not only must the Republican party abandon every platform declaration it has made to pass this bill, but it must repudiate its legislative record of the last forty years. Bills admitting New Mexico to statehood have been considered in twenty-two Congresses and have passed either the Senate or House seventeen times and both Senate and House at least twice, dying in conference. Bills admitting Arizona to statehood have passed the Senate or House several times. In every instance Republicans and Democrats alike have voted for their admission. The able Speaker of this House, in his distinguished service here of more than thirty years, has witnessed the passage through this body of most of these bills, and the absence of protest would suggest that he consented; but now, with the mercilessness of a czar, he would crush any Republican who dares to think as he thought or to vote as he voted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who reported on yesterday the rule and who always becomes the spokesman of his party when conscience is to be silenced and right crucified, has been a Member of this House in Congress after Congress when these bills passed, and never, so far as I have heard, did he raise his voice in protest against them. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS], into whose face I now look, has been for years a member of the Committee on Territories. Only four years ago he was on the subcommittee and assisted in preparing the bill admitting Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona all three to separate statehood. He is now prepared to denounce as treason that which he himself assisted in reporting and passing only a few years ago. Indeed, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. HAMILTON] was a member of that committee in the Fifty-seventh Congress when the bill making States of these Territories was passed, and neither in committee nor in the House did he oppose it. I observe that the gentleman smiles. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] frequently boasts that he is not consistent. I presume the gentleman from Michigan is one of his disciples.

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not suppose the gentleman wants me to interrupt him, but in fairness to myself I would like to say——

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I do not object to interruptions.

Mr. HAMILTON. I only want to say this to my friend from Texas. I never voted for the bill in committee. I never voted for it on the floor of the House; never voted to report it out of committee, and never had anything to do with the bill.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I think it would have been infinitely better for Arizona and New Mexico if the gentleman from Michigan had continued in his policy of doing nothing. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, you will observe that Senator FORAKER, in the paragraphs I have quoted, refers to the "new light" which gentlemen have seen, causing them to reverse themselves upon this great question. From whence did this "light" come? Not from any change for the worse in the condition of these Territories, because both Arizona and New Mexico are infinitely better prepared for statehood than they were when Republicans voted to admit them. It must be a partisan "light," because it was never a partisan question until this new "light" broke in upon the President and the Speaker. It must be a sectional "light," because it was never a sectional question until now. The Standard Oil trust and other great combinations, which have found in the East a congenial soil and which find in the West and South the only remaining obstacles to their complete mastery of the American people, may, perhaps, supply this new "light."

The Democratic record upon this matter has been consistent throughout. In its platforms it has declared in favor of separate statehood for these Territories, and in both Senate and House throughout all the long period of time this question has been pending the Democrats have done their utmost to secure the admission of these Territories.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic belief now is not only that New Mexico and Arizona should be admitted as separate States, but that Oklahoma and Indian Territory are likewise entitled to separate statehood, and we would so vote if we could do so without sacrificing their chance for statehood in some form. We believe each is large enough for a State. In area Oklahoma contains 39,030 square miles, and Indian Territory 31,000. Oklahoma alone is as large as Ohio, and the Indian Territory is much larger than West Virginia and about the size of Indiana. Each has a population more than twice that of any other State when admitted into the Union. Each now has a population greater than that of sixteen other States. No other State when admitted has ever approached either of these in resources and wealth. Their climate is delightful; their soil is most productive; their rainfall abundant. They have coal and iron and oil. They have magnificent cities springing up on every hand. They have churches and schoolhouses and colleges and universities that would do credit to any State in the Union. They have an intelligent, refined, and patriotic people, worthy of the right to work out their separate destiny in their own time and way and worthy to wear the diadem of statehood.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that in honesty and good morals the Indian Territory should be admitted to separate statehood. It is a pitiable sight to see an individual forget his honor or break his faith with his fellow-man, but it is infinitely worse to see a great government do so. The act of the individual may affect only himself, but an act of dishonor of our Government puts the stain upon every citizen. To me there is something unspeakably pathetic in the history of the Indian tribes now living in the Indian Territory. Many years ago their homes and hunting grounds were in the great forests east of the Mississippi River. They were there before the white man came there. There came a time when the white man wanted these lands. The white man and the Indian could not occupy them together in peace. The white man said the Indians must abandon them. The white man's Government—our Government—entered into the controversy. It looked westward, far beyond the border land of civilization as it then existed, and beheld a land of prairie and of forest, of rugged hills and peaceful valleys, of genial climate and fertile soil, where game was plentiful, and our Government said to these Indians: "If you will abandon your lands, which the white men covet; if you will forsake the forests that have been your home; if you will leave the ashes of your dead behind you, we will give you this new land, a land which shall be yours and your children's 'so long as fire burns and water runs.'" The Indians believed the "Great White Father at Washington" and entered into treaties with the United States, relinquishing their lands east of the Mississippi and receiving in exchange the lands embraced in what is now almost the whole of Oklahoma and Indian Territory. Not only this, but this Government made a most solemn pledge to them that this Territory should never be embraced in or annexed to any other Territory or State. I quote from some of the treaties made at this time with some of these Indian tribes. The treaty with the Cherokees contained this provision:

The United States hereby covenants and agrees that the lands ceded to the Cherokee Nation in the foregoing article shall, in no future time, without their consent, be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory.

The treaty with the Creeks and Seminoles provided this:

The United States do hereby solemnly agree and bind themselves that no State or Territory shall ever pass laws for the government of the Creek or Seminole tribes of Indians, and that no portion of either of the tracts of country defined in the first and second articles of this agreement shall ever be embraced or included within or annexed to any Territory or State, nor shall either or any part of either ever be erected into a Territory without the free and full consent of the legislative authority of the tribe owning the same.

Article 4 of the Chickasaw and Choctaw treaty was as follows:

The Government and people of the United States are hereby obliged to secure to the said Choctaw Nation of red people the jurisdiction and government of all the persons and property that may be within their limits west, so that no Territory or State shall ever have a right to pass laws for the government of the Choctaw Nation of red people and their descendants, and that no part of the land granted them shall ever be embraced in any Territory or State.

In 1871 the Government ceased to recognize these Indian tribes as independent nations, but it was with the express stipulation that all treaties made with them prior to that time should be sacredly observed. The following language occurs in the act of 1871:

No Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power with whom the United States may contract by treaty; but no obligation of any treaty lawfully made and ratified with any such nation or tribe prior to March 3, 1871, shall hereby be invalidated or impaired.

The years rolled on. The time came when the greedy, grasping, all-conquering spirit of the white man demanded that the Indian give up some portions of that which the Government said should be his forever. In Congress the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma was attempted. It took years to overcome the scruples of Congress against breaking a solemn treaty with the Indian tribes. Old Dave Culberson, of precious memory in Texas and in this House, protested against it as an act of bad faith. In another Congress Hon. Thomas B. Reed joined in a minority report in which this language was used:

The conclusions arrived at by your committee are: First, that the bill under consideration conflicts with existing treaty stipulations; second, that while the right to decide in a last resort that a treaty is no longer binding is undoubtedly lodged in Congress, the exercise of that right is a judicial act affecting the honor and dignity of the nation, requiring for its justification reasons which commend themselves to the principles of equity and good conscience, particularly where the parties to the compact with the United States are weak and powerless and depend solely on the good faith of the Government; third, that no such reasons exist for violating the treaty stipulations which reserve the Indian Territory exclusively for the Indians, and which secures to the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles the right of self-government under the restrictions of the United States Constitution.

It seems that you may as easily stay the tides of the ocean as to stay the Anglo-Saxon lust for land when it is once aroused. Oklahoma became a Territory, and from time to time other portions of the Indian Territory were added until now less than one-half of its original area remains. The influences operating to take from the Indian the control and ownership of this Territory given to him and to his forever by solemn treaty have been moving resistlessly on. His lands have been divided and parceled out under conditions that make certain the white man's ultimate ownership of it, and on March 4 of this year the tribal governments, the last link of the chain that bound them together as peoples and nations and that connects them with a past that is not without its glories, will be dissolved. Back in their cabins in the mountains, whither they have been driven by the encroachments of the white man, the few thousand full bloods of these tribes of Indians remaining will sit and weep in silent anguish over the death in a single day of their Five Nations.

And now, without their consent and even against their earnest protest, and forgetful of our solemn promise not to do so, it is proposed to merge them with another people and with another Territory and admit them to statehood as a part of Oklahoma.

Mr. Chairman, we know how useless it is to protest against this wrong. We know how intolerable the present condition in the Indian Territory is, and we know how earnestly the white people desire statehood and how they have despaired of ever securing this blessing except in connection with Oklahoma. We know that in their desperation they are anxious for statehood upon any conditions. Because the one and one-half millions of people in Oklahoma and Indian Territory need statehood so badly and can not secure it upon any other terms, every Democrat in this House is willing to vote for the admission of these Territories as the State of Oklahoma.

But, Mr. Chairman, while we have been driven by necessity to agree to the union of Oklahoma and Indian Territory in opposition to our view of what is right and what is just to them, we are unalterably opposed to the union of New Mexico and Arizona. We are reluctantly agreeing to the union of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, because it has been made clear to us that the great majority of the people of these Territories favor this union as the only feasible plan of securing statehood and because it would be a greater crime to longer deny them the right of self-government. For the same reason, because, as we believe, the people of Arizona are unalterably opposed to union with New Mexico and the people of New Mexico are opposed to the union with Arizona, we protest against the passage of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, there were thirteen States originally. There are forty-five States now. Congress has been called upon thirty-two times to perform one of the highest functions it possesses, that of lifting out of the slough of dependence the people of a defined territory and planting them upon the high, firm ground of equality granted to the States—to perform the great function of changing those who merely belong to the United States into those who are citizens of the United States. The responsibility that accompanies the exercise of this power is also great. States are made not for to-day, to-morrow, or next year, but for all time. We may legislate amiss upon questions of finance or matters of trade and the evil effects are but transient. We may for the moment be misled by passion and strife, but reason will return. The glamour of world power and the imagined glories of conquest may tempt us from our ancient landmarks, but there is chance to face about and retrieve the wrong; but when grouping in the dark night of partisanship this Congress inflicts a wrong upon the people of New Mexico and Arizona by joining them against their will, you commit a crime that all the ages can not repair.

In the admission of the thirty-two States already admitted all the territory capable of forming States has been exhausted except that embraced in the territory included in this bill. Now, when you are dealing with the last of the Territories, why should we depart from the rules that have prevailed for more than a century?

Mr. Chairman, in times past whenever any Territory has applied for admission as a State three general propositions have been considered in determining her right of admission. One was area. Was the proposed State large enough? Another was wealth. Did the proposed State have sufficient property subject to taxation to enable her to maintain a proper State government without it being too great a burden upon her citizenship? The third consideration was population. Did the proposed State have a sufficient population? I submit that measured by these same tests that have been applied to every other State that has been admitted both New Mexico and Arizona are now and have long been entitled to admission as States.

It is surely not necessary to argue that in area each of them is entitled to associate upon terms of equality with Rhode Island and the other New England States or with the States of any other section. Arizona has in round numbers 114,000 square miles, while New Mexico has 121,000. Arizona, the smaller of the two, is larger than New York and Pennsylvania, with New Jersey, New Hampshire, and Delaware thrown in. It is more than twice the size of Illinois, nine and one-half times as large as Maryland, twelve times as large as Vermont, thirteen times as large as Massachusetts, fourteen times as large as New Jersey, twenty times as large as Connecticut, fifty-five times as large as Delaware, ninety-one times as large as Rhode Island. It is as large as Indiana, Ohio, and Virginia combined.

Mr. POWERS. How many could you make of Alaska?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. You could make a great number, of course. But you can make out of Arizona three States the size of your State of Maine.

Mr. JOHNSON. Four.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. No; three, but with enough territory over to make two or three other New England States.

So it can hardly be claimed that either of these Territories is wanting in sufficient area. Have they sufficient wealth to properly support and maintain a State government? The wealth of Arizona has been estimated to be about $400,000,000. She has almost 2,000 miles of railroad within her borders. This railroad mileage is worth four times the value of all the property in Ohio, Indiana, or Michigan when these States were admitted. Its mines yielded in one year—last year—$30,000,000, which is double the value of all the property of some of the States when admitted. It is the third copper-producing district in the Union and will soon be first. There are twenty-nine banks in Arizona, with resources of more than $11,500,000. She has the largest unbroken forest in the world, with an area in excess of 6,000 square miles and with timber reserves of more than 7,000,000 acres. It has hundreds of thousands of acres of land that a few years ago were a part of the desert that have felt the vivifying touch of irrigation and are now producing in marvelous abundance. She has an educational system of which she may well be proud. In her American population there is comparatively no illiteracy. She has a compulsory system of education, with 22,000 children filling her school rooms. She pays the highest salary to her teachers, and has in her schools a larger per cent of college-bred teachers than any State in the Union. She has her system of high schools, two normal schools, and a Territorial university.

She has her asylum for the unfortunate and her penitentiary for her vicious. She has a splendid capitol and other public buildings. Her bonds are selling above par in the market places. She collected in taxes last year $675,504.85, and expended $593,071.48. All this development has occurred and all these things have been accomplished while she has been fettered and oppressed by her dependent position as a Territory. If given the prestige of statehood and the advantage that will result, who can forecast what her development will be during the next decade?

Is New Mexico rich enough for separate statehood? The assessed value of her property is $40,000,000, while its real value is nearly $400,000,000. She has nearly 3,000 miles of railway, more than many of the present States. Her farms are worth $75,000,000. She has 32 banks, with resources of nearly $10,000,000. She has produced many millions of gold and silver. She has a million and a half acres of coal land and an amount of coal in sight worth $10,000,000. She has one and a half million of cattle and nearly 6,000,000 head of sheep. In four years 737 corporations, with a capitalization of $413,884,866, were organized to develop the great resources of this Territory. In four years insurance companies wrote, in New Mexico, policies aggregating $66,511,000. She maintains 15 Territorial institutions, whose buildings and grounds are valued at $2,200,000. She has school property of the value of $2,071,000. In three years she has expended for her public schools $1,168,224. She has a school population of 75,000, with 54,000 in attendance. She has 225 churches. She has institutions for the insane, the blind, and the deaf and dumb. She maintains now a normal school and a normal university. She has a military institute, an agricultural and mechanical college, a school of mines, and a Territorial university, all under Territorial control, and all well equipped and well patronized.

With all this array of facts before us, all attesting the intellectual and moral development of these Territories, and all evidencing the marvelous material prosperity they are enjoying, who can say that these people are not now thoroughly equipped for statehood?

Has each of these Territories a sufficient population to justify statehood? Let us examine this proposition in the light of rules that have been applied in the past. Congress has heretofore adopted two rules to govern the admission of Territories into statehood, so far as population is concerned. The ordinance of 1787 fixed the conditions upon which States might be carved out of the Northwest Territory, which Virginia and others had so generously surrendered. After this ordinance had provided for the future division of this Territory into not less than three and not more than five States, and had fixed the boundary of three of them, namely, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, it contained this provision:

> And whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the Confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000.

This ordinance was afterwards extended so as to apply to the territory south of the Ohio River and later to Oregon. Under its authority Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Oregon were admitted. Under this ordinance it was conceded that when a Territory attained a population of 60,000 free people it had a right to demand immediate admission. Tennessee was the first to apply for admission under authority of this ordinance. She proceeded, without any enabling act from Congress authorizing it, to hold a convention in which she framed a constitution, and then she chose a legislature and elected her Senators and Member of Congress. She notified Congress of her action and advised that upon a certain day her Territorial government established by Congress would cease and she would take her place as a State. She took her own census and notified Congress that she had 54,000 whites and 6,000 free negroes. George Washington transmitted this constitution to Congress with the following message:

> Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives: By an act of Congress passed on the 26th of May, 1790, it was declared that the inhabitants of the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio should enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of Congress for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio; and that the government of said territory south of the Ohio should be similar to that which was then exercised in the territory northwest of the Ohio, except so far as was otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress passed the 2d of April, 1790, entitled "An act to accept a cession of the claims of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of western territory."
> Among the privileges, benefits, and advantages thus secured to the inhabitants of the territory south of the river Ohio appear to be the right of forming a permanent constitution and State government, and of admission as a State by its delegates into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever when it should have therein 60,000 free inhabitants: Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed should be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in the article of the said ordinance.
> As proofs of the several requisites to entitle the territory south of the river Ohio to be admitted as a State into the Union, Governor Blount has transmitted the return of the enumeration of its inhabitants and a printed copy of the constitution and form of government on which they have agreed, which, with letters accompanying the same, are herewith laid before Congress. (United States, April 8, 1796. G. Washington.)

Tennessee did not come as a supplicant begging for admission. She came demanding it as a right, because she had the requisite 60,000 of population.

But under this ordinance a population of 60,000 was not essential to admission into statehood. It provided: "And, so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the Confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000."

Under the authority of this last proviso Ohio was admitted in 1802 with a population of 45,000, and Illinois in 1818 with a population of 55,000.

It will thus be seen that the ordinance of 1787 provided not that there must be 60,000 people for a State, but that there must be a State for 60,000 people, leaving Congress free to create a State for a Territory having less than that number of people if it was deemed advisable to do so.

Now, what was the other rule that Congress has prescribed upon this subject? By the treaty of 1803 the territory of Louisiana was purchased by Mr. Jefferson, and out of this a number of States have been carved. In this treaty the following language occurs:

> The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

In 1819 a treaty was made with Spain under which Florida was ceded to the United States. This treaty contained the following:

> The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

In 1848 the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, under which a great area, including New Mexico and Arizona, was ceded to the United States, was made, and this treaty contains the following:

> The Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution.

I have quoted the provisions of these several treaties to show that in each of them it was contemplated that the territory secured should at the earliest practicable moment be carved into States. The language in each was a covenant and promise that this would be done. In one it was stipulated that the people should be "admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States," and substantially the same language was used in the other treaties.

Arkansas was the first of this territory to seek admittance as a State, and it was necessary for Congress to interpret the meaning of the phrase, "according to the principles of the Federal Constitution." After protracted discussion it was agreed that it meant that when a people in an area called a "Territory" reached the point in population where this population was equal to the number of people required for a Congressional district in a State, then that they should be admitted as a State.

Under the ordinance of 1787, while a Territory had a right to demand admission as a State when its population reached 60,000, yet such Territory could be properly admitted by Congress when it had a much smaller population, and likewise Congress interpreted the provisions in these treaties to mean that while a Territory could demand admission into the Union as a matter of right when its population was equal to the unit of representation in Congress, yet Congress could admit such Territory when its population was far below the point named. The instances of such admission when the population was far below the unit of representation prevailing at such time are numerous. Florida when admitted had a population of 54,000, when the basis of representation was 70,000; Oregon came in with 52,000 people, when the unit was 93,000. Nevada was admitted in 1864 by the Republican party for partisan purposes, with a population of only 6,800 at the preceding census, when the unit of representation was 127,000; and in 1866 both Houses of Congress passed a bill admitting Colorado when her population was less than 30,000, when the basis of representation was 127,000. The next year Nebraska was admitted when her population was only 60,000. I call attention to the fact that all the territory that came to us as a result of the three great treaties named has been carved into States except that embraced in this bill. With respect to all the balance the rule I have been referring to was the only one applied; but now, when the last of all the Territories are seeking admittance, Republicans demand a new rule and a severer test than have ever been applied to any other people. The same party that admitted Nevada in 1864, when in 1860 her population was less than 7,000, to serve a mean partisan purpose, does not hesitate now to serve a purpose equally mean and sectional by refusing admission to Arizona with her 180,000 people and to New Mexico with her 300,000 people unless they agree to come in together.

We oppose the union of New Mexico and Arizona because New Mexico, if a free expression of her will could be secured, opposes the union. She feels that she is entitled to separate admission. More than fifty years ago she adopted a constitution, elected her Senators and a Member of Congress, and hand in hand with California sought admission. California was admitted and New Mexico was rejected, though both came supported by the solemn treaty obligation that they should be admitted. For fifty years with patient earnestness she has waited and waited for the fruition of her hopes. She has built up her own institutions, maintained her own civilization, and wrought out her own destiny, and now it is proposed to destroy her identity and her very name. She protests against it; protests against the violation of public faith, and protests to the President against the violation of the promise he voluntarily made her. At Las Vegas, in 1899, in the course of a speech, President Roosevelt said:

> All I shall say is that if New Mexico wants to be a State you can count me in, and I will go to Washington to speak for you or do anything you wish.

The President has not kept that promise.

We oppose this union because Arizona opposes it. She opposes it, because for almost fifty years she has been led to believe that she would ultimately receive in fullest measure the blessings of statehood.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman permit just one more interruption?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON. In reference to the statehood of Arizona I want to call the gentleman's attention to this language of the act of February 4, 1863, organizing the Territory of Arizona and separating it from New Mexico:

> Provided, That nothing contained in the provisions of this act shall be construed to prohibit the Congress of the United States from dividing said Territory or changing its boundaries in such manner and at such times as it may deem proper.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I am entirely familiar with that provision, but there is another provision in that same act creating the Territory of Arizona, which the gentleman does not read, which gave those people a solemn promise that they should finally be admitted as a State. [Applause.] If gentlemen desire to be fair in their discussion of this question, let them submit all the facts, omitting none.

Mr. HAMILTON. In fairness to both of us I will quote the language of the statute.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I have it here, and will read it for the benefit of the House. Speaking of the government of Arizona, it says:

> That said government shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in such Territory shall have the consent of Congress to form a State government, republican in form, as prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and apply for and obtain admission into the Union as a State.

The people of Arizona have believed that this obligation meant something. They have recognized that Congress reserved the right to divide her territory if it should be considered too large, but they have never recognized the right of Congress to merge her with a Territory still larger. They have conceded that Congress has the right to change her boundary lines, but they have never believed that Congress would blot out the line of division made when she was separated from New Mexico. For more than forty years Arizona and New Mexico have walked apart, each working out its destiny in its own peculiar way. Their customs and habits, their hopes and ambitions, their language and religion, their history and their traditions have all been different, and the conditions that required their separation more than a generation ago still require it now. The God of nature and of nations decreed that they should live apart. The great continental divide of mountains has created a mighty barrier between them that the puny hand of Congress can not destroy. People of the western counties of New Mexico and people of the eastern part of Arizona, though near together, when measured by miles are yet as far apart as though an uncharted ocean rolled between them.

It has never been the policy to unite two political divisions into one in order to create a State. Why should it be done now? Territories, and even States, have been divided, but never two united. Vermont separated herself from New York before the Constitution was adopted. For political purposes Maine was created out of the larger part of Massachusetts. When Texas was admitted it was upon condition that she might make of herself five separate States. While the passions of war were rife the Republican party laid its cruel hand upon Virginia, the dear old mother of so many States, and tore from her side the State of West Virginia. Out of Dakota two States, North and South Dakota, were formed. The rule has always been that of division, not addition; separation of one into two political divisions, not the combination of two into one.

But gentlemen from the East say that these Territories are barren, desolate, and unproductive for the most part, and can never separately become worthy to wear the crowns of statehood. New England has prophesied before. If the Government should do no more for New England than it has done for these Territories a great part of New England would become barren and unproductive waste.

In 1811, when Congress was considering the question of admitting some of the territory purchased from France by Mr. Jefferson as a State into the Union, Mr. Josiah Quincy said:

> If this bill passes it is virtually a dissolution of the Union. It will free the States from their moral obligations and, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, definitely to prepare for a separation—amicably if they can, violently if they must.

This first threat of secession was made by a Member from Massachusetts. And for what reason? Because Congress was preparing to admit into the Union some of the great West. Mr. Chairman, without the great West, which New England so despised, to feed and clothe her New England would be hungry and shivering to-day and her cities would be silent in the stagnation of death. That great West has been the brawn and muscle, the heart and brains of this nation. In peace it has made her prosperity the marvel of the world, and in war it preserved her from dissolution and death. Without the Lincoln of the West, the Grant of the West, the Sherman of the West, and the legions upon legions of soldiers from the West who marched to the music of the Union, the men who followed the strains of Dixie would have knocked at the gates of every city in the Eastern and Middle States and would have swept their armies off the field of battle.

When California sought admission, men from the East, among whom was Webster, said that a large portion of it was destined to remain a desert. The strong and rugged men of that State have answered the charge by making that very portion of California by far the richest of all. The "wise men of the East" once called a great part of the country west of the Mississippi River "the Great American Desert." That "Great American Desert" lives only in memory now. Men have waged war with the desert and have made it yield abundant harvests. West of the Mississippi River two-thirds of the area of this country is located, and toward this section the great tides of population and development are flowing. Under present conditions a comparatively small part of this country is controlling its legislation, while that controlling portion is itself controlled by the basest influences in American politics. While this condition prevails it is not surprising that a few are favored while the many are forgotten. This is the last opportunity that will ever exist to correct some of these inequalities of representation in the United State Senate, to escape in some degree from the dominion and control of those who believe that the world is bounded on the east by Cape Cod and on the west by the Alleghany Mountains.

We oppose this bill because, considering their rough and mountainous character, the union of New Mexico and Arizona will make a State of unwieldly proportions. Communication between its different parts will be too difficult and too expensive. The two combined will make a State containing 235,000 square miles. It will be as large as all of the New England States with New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, and Indiana added. From portions of Arizona to the proposed capital is as far as from Washington to Boston, or from Iowa to New York. It will be larger than the whole of France by 28,000 square miles; 27,000 square miles larger than the entire German Empire in Europe; 88,000 square miles larger than Japan with the island of Formosa added; twice as large as Italy with 15,000 square miles over; 40,000 square miles larger than Spain. It will be six times as large as Portugal; 63,000 square miles larger than Sweden; twenty times as large as Belgium; ten times as large as Greece; fifteen times as large as Denmark; four and a half times as large as England; eight times as large as Scotland; seven times as large as Ireland, and twice as large as the entire United Kingdom.

This proposed State will be twenty-five times larger than Vermont; twenty-five times larger than New Jersey; thirty times larger than Massachusetts; sixty times larger than Connecticut; one hundred and seventeen times larger than Delaware, and one hundred and eighty-eight times larger than Rhode Island. It is even several times larger than the State of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. KLEPPER. You could make five States the size of Maine out of Texas.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Why, my dear sir, you have but a poor conception of the size of Texas. Instead of five you could make about eight. In fact, Texas would have to "spread herself" but just a little to make five States like Missouri. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, references have constantly been made during this debate and in committee to the size of Texas and her refusal to permit herself to be divided. The conditions existing in Texas and that have always existed are so different from the conditions in New Mexico and Arizona that any argument based upon an attempted comparison must, of necessity, be faulty. Arizona and New Mexico might be fused into one great, prosperous, and harmonious State if conditions prevailed there like those in Texas—if they had a homogeneous people, alike in race and religion, with the same interests and industries, and the same memories and traditions. But this is not the case. Their people are unlike; their institutions are different; their religions are in conflict, and their interests clash.

It is not so with Texas. Before the white man came it was Texas then. It was Texas when, as a part of Mexico, it came out from under the dominion of Spain. It was our Texas that defied the rule of Mexico. It was our Texas that existed for ten years as a separate and independent republic. It was our Texas that came into the Union and afterwards linked her fortunes with the Confederacy and then came again into the Union. Amidst the shock of her revolution her flag bore a single star, and it blazes upon her flag now. The same threads run throughout all of her history, and these conditions have begotten a sentiment in Texas that makes division impossible. I observe that gentlemen smile at the thought of such a sentiment controlling a people upon so great a question, but so long as we exist as a people, venerating our institutions and honoring our past, such sentiments as I have named will thrill our hearts and ennoble our lives. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, upon every side we see some manifestation of the spirit to which I have alluded. The flag that hangs in graceful folds above your chair is but strips of silk that separate and apart mean nothing. Combine them and let the stars flash from a field of blue and you have the flag of our country, at the very sight of which our souls are filled with patriotic fervor. Let it be one tattered and torn by the strife of battle and we touch it reverently and kiss it tenderly, because there is a sentiment that hallows it.

A few days ago something occurred here with reference to the old ship Constitution. A great petition was presented against its destruction. What is that old ship that it should be preserved? It is but a dismantled and rotting mass of wood and iron. In the marts of trade, in the markets of the world, it would have but little intrinsic value. We could construct a vessel of equal value and send it out upon the deep to be destroyed by American guns and nobody would protest against it. But this is "Old Ironsides," that rode the waves amidst the thunder of battle a hundred years ago; the blood of dying men stained and hallowed her decks, and when it is proposed to ruthlessly destroy her the voices of our living and the memories of our dead protest against it. [Applause.]

So it is with Texas. If area alone were considered, Texas could be divided. You could divide her forests and her prairies, her mountains and her valleys; but there are some things about Texas you can not divide. There is her Alamo—greater than the Thermopylæ of old. The babes of Texas have been taught to lisp the names of Travis and Crockett and Bowie and the others who died there. The Alamo belongs alike to all, and no son of Texas would be so unworthy as to surrender his claim to it. There is Goliad and there is the field of San Jacinto. In dividing Texas could these battlefields be divided also and their glories parceled out to different States? There is the memory of Houston; of Austin; of Burleson; of Rusk; of Albert Sidney Johnston; of Roberts, the "Old Alcalde;" of Reagan, the "Grand Old Man," who loved Texas and who was beloved by Texas, and a great host of other illustrious ones. Can such memories be weighed and measured and apportioned to different sections? The soldiers who went from Texas homes mingled in the tumult of every great battle of the war between the blue and the gray, and they sleep upon every field from Gettysburg to the Gulf. Will anyone be found so base as to give up the memory of their deathless deeds?

No, Mr. Chairman, to give up any of these to one section would be to impoverish all others. They belong to Texas—to all of Texas, and not a part of Texas. They were given to us by the fathers, and we must hand them down to our children. They belonged to Texas in her weakness; they must still be hers in her strength. They comforted and blessed her in her night of sorrow; they must adorn her in her day of triumph. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration, under the special order of the House, House bill 12707, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SELECTION OF JURORS IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. BIRDSALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5289) to provide for the selection of grand and petit jurors for the district court in the Territory of Oklahoma.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman? This bill comes from the Judiciary Committee with a unanimous recommendation for its passage. It is very much needed in order that the laws of Oklahoma may be enforced. A decision of the court out there has set aside the present jury law, so that they have no law for the selection of jurors, and this bill is to provide a system for drawing grand and petit jurors for the trial of cases, and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not object.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I did not rise to object, but to get some information about the matter. If it is the unanimous report of the committee, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That until otherwise provided by the legislature of Oklahoma it shall be the duty of the judge of the district court in each judicial district of the Territory of Oklahoma to appoint in each county of his district two discreet, honorable, and reputable persons of opposite politics, and having the qualifications of jurors as prescribed by the laws of said Territory, and not interested in any cause, civil or criminal, pending in the district court of the county for which he is appointed, which two persons, together with the clerk of the district court, or his resident deputy, in such county, shall constitute a board of jury commissioners. Said commissioners shall meet at the office of the clerk of the district court upon the order of the judge of said court at least once each year, at such time as the judge shall disignate, and after having taken and subscribed an oath that they will honestly, faithfully, and impartially discharge their duties as such jury commissioners, shall proceed to select from the names recorded upon the poll books of persons who voted in said county at the last preceding general election held for the election of county officers the names of not less than 300 nor more than 325 persons, having and possessing the qualifications of jurors as prescribed by the laws of said Territory of Oklahoma. Said names for jurors shall be apportioned to and selected from the several voting precincts in said county as near as practicable according to the voting population of each precinct. The board of jury commissioners shall make a list of said names, showing the election precinct from which each juror was selected, and shall certify to the same and file said list in the office of the clerk of the district court for the county for which said names were selected. The clerk shall record said list upon the journal of the court and certify to the correctness thereof. As soon as said list is completed and recorded the clerk of the district court shall forthwith write each of said names upon a separate slip of paper, which slips shall be of uniform size and color, and shall fold said slips and place them in a box provided with two locks and keys of different designs and securely lock the same, leaving no opening. When said box is closed and locked, the key of one lock shall be retained by the clerk and the other shall be delivered to and retained by the sheriff of the county. Prior to any term of court at which a grand or petit jury will be required the judge of the district court shall certify to the clerk of the district court the number of jurors that will be required for either a grand or a petit jury, and direct said jury to be drawn and summoned at such times as he shall direct. Upon receiving such order the clerk of the district court shall notify the sheriff of the time of the drawing of such jury, and the sheriff or one of his deputies, and the clerk of the district court or one of his deputies, shall take said box containing the names of the jurors so selected and thoroughly shake the same. They shall then together, in the presence of each other, open said jury box, and after placing the same in a position that neither can see into it, shall draw therefrom alternately one name at a time and record the same until the number of jurors have been drawn required in the order of the judge, which may be not to exceed thirty persons from which to select a grand jury and not to exceed forty persons from which to select a petit jury. As soon as said jurors are drawn and the names recorded, the slips shall be destroyed and the box securely locked and retained in the custody of the clerk, one key being retained by the sheriff. Upon the completion of such drawing the clerk shall issue separate venires for the grand and petit jurors, returnable at such time as the judge shall in his order direct. The first names drawn to the number stated in the judge's order shall be summoned as grand jurors, and the grand jury shall be empaneled from said persons: Provided, That additional and other drawings may be had at such times as the court or judge may order for the completion of the panel of either the grand or petit jury, or for the empaneling of a new grand jury during any term of court, if, in the judgment of the court, the same shall become necessary, or if, for any cause, the court, in its discretion, shall deem other jurors necessary. The court may excuse or discharge any person drawn and summoned as a grand or petit juror whenever, in the discretion of the court, such action may be deemed expedient: Provided further, That at any time during a term of court after a petit jury has been drawn and summoned in the manner as herein provided, when for the trial of any cause, civil or criminal, the regular panel of jurors shall appear to be insufficient, the jury may be completed from talesmen or the court may direct that an open venire issue to the marshal or sheriff for such number of jurors as may be deemed necessary to be selected from the body or any portion of the county.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners shall each receive as compensation for his services the sum of $10 per day for each day actually and necessarily employed in the discharge of their duties, to be paid upon the order of the judge of the district court, either by the United States or the county, as the judge in his order shall direct. The venires for juries, grand or petit, may be served by either the United States marshal or the sheriff of the county, as the court or judge shall order.

SEC. 3. That all laws of the Territory of Oklahoma inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The following amendments, recommended by the committee, were read:

Insert after the word "That," in the third line on page 1, the words "until otherwise provided by the legislature of Oklahoma."

Strike all after the word "select," in line 4 on page 2, down to and including the word "officers," in line 7 on page 2.

Insert after the word "county," in line 23 on page 4, the following: "And provided further, The probate judges of the several counties may order a jury drawn in like manner from said jury box for any term of the probate court or for the trial of any cause in said court wherein a jury is authorized by the laws of Oklahoma to be drawn from such box."

Insert after the word "duties," in line 2 on page 5, the words "the time necessarily employed to be determined by the judge and."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BIRDSALL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, change of reference was made of the bill (H. R. 64) making an appropriation for the administration and improvement of the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington, from the Committee on the Public Lands to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 87. Joint resolution to authorize use of transport Sumner to convey members of Santiago Battlefield Commission and others to Cuba and return.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. GOEBEL was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of bill H. R. 5649 (granting a pension to Martha Kates), first session Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Also, to Mr. GOEBEL, to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of bill H. R. 5648 (granting an increase of pension to William Hand), first session Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are a number of requests for time to speak upon the statehood bill, I ask unanimous consent that the House come in to-morrow at 11 o'clock instead of 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the House meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock instead of 12 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an appropriation for equipment of the new public building at Seattle, Wash.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with recommendation, a draft of a bill relating to the custody and control of certain buildings at Perry and Kingfisher, Okla.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an additional estimate of appropriation for the Southern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 25, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. TILLMAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

Mr. TILLMAN. Have we reached the order of petitions and memorials?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will first lay before the Senate an executive communication.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well.

ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents for the year ended December 31, 1905; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5289) to provide for the selection of grand and petit jurors for the district courts in the Territory of Oklahoma; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 87) to authorize the use of the transport Sumner to convey members of the Santiago Battlefield Commission and others to Cuba and return, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

OVERCAPITALIZATION OF RAILROADS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, we have had some discussion during the week on the subject of railway-rate regulation. There has been some presentation of views by different Senators on one of the most important phases of it—overcapitalization. In order to contribute in a feeble way to the subject I have here a very important paper, a letter from Prof. William D. Marks, a very distinguished engineer, publicist, and statistician, which I ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the communication sent by him to the desk shall be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

DECEMBER 11, 1905.

Hon. WHARTON BARKER, Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our verbal interviews regarding the overcapitalization of the steam railway corporations of this United States, and more particularly in reply to your query of the 5th current, "Let me know what you think a fair capitalization of the railroads or capitalization the public should pay for," I would say that in my experience of late years as a consulting engineer I have been struck by the deplorable and almost universal "watering" of securities in railway corporations practiced by our promoters of these enterprises.

Not only are our railways often wastefully built wholly upon the proceeds of the sale of bonds at figures far below par, but the promoters frequently add to the burden of the earnings of their enterprises by issuing as a bonus (to go with the bonds or appropriated by themselves) an equal or greater amount of stock, representing a speculative profit in the future.

So invariably have I found this to be the case that I felt justified, after numerous individual experiences, in saying to you that more than one-half of the railway securities issued represented no real property or investment of cash.

Besides the "water" injected into securities by the original builders of a new railway, other and often larger percentages of it are poured in by financiers who have found their profit in combining a number of individual railways into a "system" by means of a holding and operating corporation.

As a result we frequently find stratum of securities piled upon stratum of securities until a chart of the securities of a system of some railway systems very closely resembles a geological section.

There can (if my statement is correct) be but one of two results of these manipulations.

Either the public is robbed by overcharging to render these watered securities valuable to their owners or innocent purchasers of them lose all or a portion of their investments, if they have been led to believe that their securities represent real property.

Tersely, either the traveler and shipper are robbed or the purchaser of securities is swindled if he buys believing them to have been honestly issued.

The purchaser of "water" securities is either helping thieves to rob the public or is himself the victim of thieves.

But probably my general experience and feeling in these matters will not serve to convince you or others, and I will ask your careful attention to an analysis of the Massachusetts railroad commissioner's report, 1904:

Returns of year ending June 30, 1903.

	Miles owned.
Massachusetts railways, total length of lines	3,794
Massachusetts railways, total length of single track	7,601

The cost of construction of these lines, excluding equipment, land, and buildings, securities of other companies, cash, and miscellaneous assets, is given as $293,236,332; in round figures, $73,800 per mile of roadbed; $38,600 per mile of single track.

This single-track valuation is the important item, for it includes every foot of track, wherever or however used.

Omitting long bridges, tunnels, heavy rock cuts, extraordinary excavations, allowing 10,000 cubic yards excavation per mile, the cash cost of the average standard-gauge railway to the top of the rail head is, from many instances, about as follows, when prudently constructed:

Preliminary legal papers and rights of way	$700
Civil engineering construction to top of rail	11,000
Architects, stations, shops, and houses	1,500
Total	13,200

Of course, we have excepted long bridges (say over 60-foot span) and other unusual features, but throughout Massachusetts and the United States there are very few railways requiring 10,000 cubic yards excavation ($3,500) per mile.

There are notable individual instances of costly and unavoidable engineering expense, but these will be balanced by the average savings from $13,200 allowance per mile for construction.

We see that the average book cost, $38,600, of construction is nearly three times the necessary cost, $13,200, of steam railways to the rail top.

The cost of equipment of the Massachusetts railways is given as $32,057,122. By this is principally meant the rolling stock. For the purpose of this comparison I will place very high figures upon it, though much of it is old and largely depreciated in value.

Locomotives, 2,277, at $10,000 each	$22,770,000
Passenger cars, 3,338, at $5,000 each	16,690,000
Baggage and mail cars, 650, at $3,000 each	1,950,000
Freight cars, 34,825, at $500 each	17,412,500
Gravel and construction cars, 1,865, at $400 each	746,000

Many of these locomotives and cars are leased, but for the purpose of our discussion they should be valued, and so we had better fix their total cost at, say, $76,000,000 instead of $33,000,000—book value given.

There are 7,601 miles of single track owned, and with sufficient accuracy for our purposes we can put the first cost of equipment with rolling stock at $10,000 per mile, a very liberal estimate for the Massachusetts railways, which serve a denser population than exists in any other portions of this United States, and which, being a manufacturing community, must use its railways largely.

We have omitted occasional extraordinary expenditures, say, for the tunnels and long bridges over rivers and also for rock cuts and deep excavations.

We are perfectly safe, however, in allowing an average of $2,000 per mile of track, or $15,202,000, to cover the cash cost of these extras.

Recapitulating for the average honest cash cost of Massachusetts railways, we have for each mile of single track owned:

Preliminary legal papers and right of way	$700
Civil engineering construction to top of rail	11,000
Minor stations, machine shops, and houses	1,500
Equipment of locomotives and cars	10,000
Extraordinary expenditures	2,000
Estimated cost of construction and equipment per mile	25,200

Massachusetts has been selected because its railroad commissioners have largely reduced the usual amount of corporate dishonesty by their most careful examinations and enforced publicity of corporate accounts.

Its dense population requires a larger equipment than the average of the rest of the United States. Its costs of construction are increased by reason of its rocky soil and hilly topography far above the average of many other sections.

I have increased the stated book value of equipment from $33,000,000 to $76,000,000; I have added $15,000,000 to well-known standard average costs of construction; I have allowed $11,400,000 for architectural work, and as a result I have obtained an average cash cost per mile of $25,200, which I have no doubt substantially exceeds the true costs of railways.

In education, frugality, industry, and honesty Massachusetts's population stands in the first rank of these United States, and yet we have the following capitalization of the Massachusetts railways:

Funded debt	$133,435,355
Mortgages, etc. (?)	25,007,318
Capital stock	235,834,466
Total capitalization	394,277,139

Dividing this by 7,601 miles of single track, we obtain about $52,000 capitalization per mile—51½ per cent of water, probably more.

Referring to gross assets of companies given on page 9, Massachusetts railroad commission report, June 30, 1903, we find as book accounts, but probably not the practical truth:

Construction	$293,236,332
Equipment	32,957,122
Land and buildings	1,497,218
Cash	40,880,067
Total	368,570,739
Stocks, bonds, and other property	64,210,110
Gross assets	432,780,849

The item of $64,000,000 probably represents "strategic purchases," having no proper relation to expenditures required to operate the roads for the convenience of the public and the profit of the stockholders.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, June 30, 1903, reports total miles of single track 283,821.52. (This is not the length of road bed, which is less; it is the total length of all the tracks wherever placed.) Outside of Massachusetts, with a few exceptions in the Eastern and Middle States, the equipment rarely costs as much as $5,000 per mile, and we are liberal in putting the cash cost of construction and equipment of all at an average of $20,000 per mile, or $5,676,420,000. The total railway capital June 30, 1903, was (Interstate Commerce Commission report) $12,599,990,258, or about $7,000,000,000 watered securities and $5,600,000,000 actual value.

Experienced engineers (I mean those who have been through the mill) will tell you the same as I do as to actual costs of constructions and equipment, if not (as in most cases) prevented by personal fear of consequences from disclosing the truth.

You may and probably will have many instances of extraordinary cost of construction brought to prove to you the higher cost of our railways. Many of these instances are both unwise and unnecessary expenditures.

Do not forget that for every such case there are hundreds of miles of railway which honestly have not cost $17,500 per mile to construct and equip; on the contrary, very much less.

The fairest index of the proper cost of a railway is not to its length of roadbed, but its length of single track.

Twenty thousand dollars per mile is an overestimate of the average cost of most railways crossing the vast prairies of the West.

You will note that I have not brought forward the many individual instances which have come to my notice upon which I based my former statements to you, but have delayed long enough to enable me to verify them, generally by a consideration of all the railways of Massachusetts.

For thirty-four years, beginning on the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western road, as a civil engineer, in the days of the crimes of Fisk & Gould, of the Erie, I have watched the growth of this criminal method called "watering" securities, and to-day we find that their success had led to the perpetration by their imitators of a colossal fraud reaching $7,000,000,000 upon the citizens of this United States.

I wish you godspeed in trying to put a stop to it. If you succeed you will earn the gratitude of every honest man.

I return to you the bill, which could be much improved, and I also hand you Engineering News, November 2, 1905, containing a brief article of mine on railway rates for an electric railway, and the following papers: "What are the facts?" by Slason Thompson; "Facts about railroad rates," by H. T. Newcomb; "Solution transportation problem," by P. S. Grosscup; Massachusetts Railroad Commissioners' Report, June 30, 1903.

After you have read my article in the Engineering News I wish you would refer to Census Bulletins Nos. 3 and 21, just to see how carefully they have avoided giving the required data enabling the fixing of the cost of construction, equipment, and operation of the railways they pretend to deal with.

To the engineer's lot it falls to deal with the concrete and tangible, and when he seeks help from these expensive publications by our Government he finds that because no one compiling the data in them appears to have power to demand replies on practical experience and grasp that all our Government statisticians have fallen victims to the conspiracy of secrecy among railway promoters and operators who, above all things, fear honest publicity for their deeds.

Very truly, yours,

WM. D. MARKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will refer the letter just read to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have it printed as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina requests that the communication be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

STATUE OF COUNT DE ROCHAMBEAU.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. WETMORE December 13, 1905, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the concurrent resolution passed February 2, 1904, providing for the publication of the proceedings on the occasion of the unveiling of the Rochambeau statue is hereby continued in force and excepted from the limitation of one year as provided in section 80 of the act of January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

FRENCH COMBATANTS IN AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 16th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 copies of Senate Document No. 77, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, "Les Combattants Françaises de la Guerre Américaine, 1778–1783," of which 500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 for the use of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, to be distributed under the direction of A. Howard Clark, registrar.

REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN SCHOOLS.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print from the stereotype plates 1,500 copies of the Report of the Superintendent of Indian Schools for 1905, for the use of the Department of the Interior.

REPORT OF RECLAMATION SERVICE.

Mr. PLATT. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 17) to print the Fourth Annual Report of the United States Reclamation Service, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides for printing 9,000 copies of the Fourth Annual Report of the Reclamation Service, of which 1,000 are to be bound in form similar to the preceding reports of the Service; and of that entire edition 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Director of the Geological Survey.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT ON THE REFORMATORY SYSTEM.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed and bound in cloth, for the use of the Department of State, 1,000 copies of the report on "The Reformatory System in the United States," House Document No. 459, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT POINT JUDITH, R. I.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. ALDRICH on the 22d instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inform the Senate whether changed conditions necessitate a change of project for the main breakwater of the harbor of refuge at Point Judith, R. I., and if so, to submit plans and estimates for such revised project.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUBURN, ME.

Mr. SCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 25) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Auburn, in the State of Maine, to report it with amendments. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the bill.

Mr. FRYE. As that is practically my own city, there being simply between mine and it a narrow frith, I hope the Senate will indulge me in allowing it to be considered now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Auburn, Me., the cost of the site and building, including the vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $50,000.

The first amendment of the committee was to strike out section 4 in the following words:

SEC. 4. That if, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after said examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all maps, statements, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 5 in the following words:

SEC. 5. That the compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

SEC. 6. That the building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FAYETTEVILLE, N. C.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S.1277) authorizing a public building at Fayetteville, N. C., to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, or otherwise acquire, a suitable site at Fayetteville, N. C., and cause to be erected thereon a suitable public building to accommodate the needs of the United States post-office at that place, and for other public purposes, at a total cost not to exceed $75,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A bill (S. 3714) granting an increase of pension to James Ruth.

Mr. HEMENWAY introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 3715) granting an increase of pension to Samuel S. Watson;

A bill (S. 3716) granting an increase of pension to Isaac G. Cisnea; and

A bill (S. 3717) granting an increase of pension to Paul L. Bahr.

Mr. NEWLANDS introduced a bill (S. 3718) declaring the purpose of the United States regarding the future government of the Philippine Islands, providing for a Philippine agricultural bank, for the issue and guaranty of Philippine bonds for public and railroad construction, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. FULTON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 25) authorizing the Secretary of War to negotiate with John T. Dolan, of Portland, Oreg., for purchase of original manuscript copy of "Order Book of General Arthur Saint Clair;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to strike out the words "Amsterdam, Netherlands," where they occur in Class IV, Schedule B, and insert the same words in Class III of said schedule, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATIONS AT TESTING PLANTS AT ST. LOUIS.

Mr. HEMENWAY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate a summary of the results obtained in the investigations, under the Director of the Geological Survey, of fuels and structural materials at the testing plants at St. Louis, and a statement of his opinion, with the reasons therefor, whether or not it is desirable for the Government to continue the investigations, together with an estimate of the amount of money which will be necessary to carry on the investigations in a satisfactory manner, during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1906.

GEORGIA RAILROAD AND BANKING COMPANY.

Mr. BACON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the claim of the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company (Senate bill 819) be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, commonly known as the "Tucker Act."

ESTATE OF J. P. LAMAR.

Mr. BACON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the claim of the legal representatives of J. P. Lamar, deceased (Senate bill 818), be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, commonly known as the "Tucker Act."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 5289. An act to provide for the selection of grand and petit jurors for the district courts, in the Territory of Oklahoma, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CHINESE BOYCOTT OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I submit a resolution, which I send to the desk, for which I should like immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the boycott of American manufactured products by the people of China is a matter of very serious and deep concern to the capitalists and laborers interested in those industries; and

Whereas it is understood that the former United States minister, Wu Ting Fang, is a leader of this movement among his countrymen, assigning as a reason therefor the outrages and indignities put upon Chinese travelers and students under our immigration laws, and through the unwise and drastic methods which have been followed in executing these laws; and

Whereas the policy thus stigmatized by the Chinese is not such as should be followed by one great nation in dealing with another; and

Whereas it is in the interest of our commercial expansion and growth that the just complaints of the Chinese people should be carefully investigated and the whole subject presented to Congress for its guidance and information: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on Immigration shall consider and, after thorough investigation, report to the Senate the facts in the case and suggest any remedies that may be deemed advisable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution will go over.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR MITCHELL.

Mr. FULTON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay the expenses incident to the sickness and death of the Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL, late a Senator from the State of Oregon, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, amounting to $547.75.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, that order is closed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I wish to ask if the morning business is concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business has been concluded and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has been recognized. He has asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. MONEY. I was going to remark, Mr. President, that I gave notice yesterday that I would take the floor at this hour, but I will yield to the Senator from Wyoming if the bill for which he asks consideration is one which will require no discussion. If it is a bill which will require discussion, I shall have to object to its present consideration.

Mr. WARREN. I shall not insist upon its consideration if it shall lead to debate.

Mr. MONEY. Let the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I now understand that the bill is liable to lead to some discussion, and as I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senator from Mississippi I will ask that the bill may go over, retaining its space on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

MOROCCAN CONFERENCE AND RELATIONS WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, in the discussion which has engaged the attention of the Senate for several meetings the dominant note has been the authority of the President of the United States or his impolicy, if he has the authority and the inexpediency of action in regard to our foreign relations in some particulars.

In that debate almost everything has been brought in. The affairs of Santo Domingo have been discussed from every possible point of view, constitutionally, historically, commercially, the Monroe doctrine, considerations of humanity, of propinquity, of national obligation; also the affair now in process at Algeciras, to which we have sent delegates by invitation of Morocco, has been considered with reference to the President's power and, if he had the power, whether it was wholly advisable, or at all advisable, under the conditions prevalent there that we should be represented, with the inferential consequences and obligations that might be imposed on account of our community in the consideration of the questions presented.

It has been stated here, Mr. President, that the questions considered there would be of a purely political character, in which the interests of the United States were in no measure whatever involved; that we had notice, as did the other powers there represented, that matters of commercial import were not to be considered, or perhaps, to state it more exactly, that no commercial interests of any party invited would be disturbed by the result of that conference; which meant, of course, that they were not to be considered, for no man could guarantee that they would not be disturbed if they were matters of conference and consideration. So it resolved itself into a question of European politics—"European," it is called, but really European and African, for Morocco embraces a district of country lying along the South Mediterranean of 200,000 square miles, containing 10,000,000 people of the Mohammedan faith—a country which was once the most beautiful section of the globe, once the seat of mighty empires, that succeeded each other one after another through several thousands of years; a country now capable of enormous possibilities if the energies of its people could be concentrated and used in some wise way.

The political condition prevalent there is unsatisfactory to the observer, if he be a civilized man, wherever he may be, as a student of history and of civilization. There is a great movement of a philosophical character, at least of changes of government, and even in the characters of the people; but the question is whether the United States of America as a Government, whether this great people as a nation, has any concern whatever in questions that are now at an acute crisis in the deliberations at Algeciras, if we may credit the morning newspapers.

Right at this point I may be permitted to indulge in a compliment to my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who, with a very clear prognosis, said the very things which have come to pass were likely to come to pass, and also to pay my small tribute of admiration to the independent Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who, in the speech which he made the other day, full of pith and moment, in the most independent manner criticised this whole affair, except that he made a failure in predicting that the representatives of the United States would be immediately withdrawn if the crisis should be reached which was reached yesterday. I could not agree with the Senator when he announced that proposition, because the President of the United States is not a man who marches his men up the hill and then marches them down again. He is too positive a character for that. When he sent representatives to that general conference of European powers interested in the Moroccan question, it was not his intention that they should withdraw at the critical moment, but that at the critical moment they should be there, so that the United States, to use his favorite expression, should be felt as a world power.

Now, there is the whole question; whether the United States should be there as a great world power or in any other capacity; whether, in other words, his love of the Monroe doctrine is entirely one-sided; in other words, like the fish trap that caught all the fish going one way and let none go the other. It was said by Thomas Jefferson, the father of the Monroe doctrine, some twenty years before it was promulgated by Mr. Monroe, that he would draw a line through the middle of the Atlantic and the middle of the Pacific, and that he would have no interest of America beyond and no interest of Europe to hither side.

Mr. President, whether or not any good will come to the United States from the conference at Algeciras is not a debatable question. That we will be respected any more because we put our hand in the kettle of the European combination I can not admit. Whether the President had the authority under the Constitution to send anybody to Algeciras, is a question which I do not think is disputable. I believe the President of the United States has the right to send, when invited, delegates to any conference with any other power in the world, but the question of its wisdom and policy is one that can fairly be debated here. I say it can be fairly debated here, because, as was so lucidly and clearly and briefly and tersely stated the other day by the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], in the original the question of making treaties was intended for the Senate. You are all, I presume, more or less familiar with that contention in the convention, and while much more could be said, yet the Senator from Maine stated all that was necessary to be stated in the brief time allowed here for debate when he said the intention was first on the part of some members of the convention who made the Constitution of the United States that the Senate should originate treaties; then it should be a joint production; and then, yielding the love of independence and of power which they wished should reside in the States as sovereigns represented in this Chamber, to the practice of the whole world, which had given the Chief Executive the initiative power in making treaties, they made the present combination of power.

You will notice, as I showed the other day in a brief interruption, that the language of the Constitution is this, "that the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, shall make treaties," and so on; and in the same paragraph follows "and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice of the Senate, shall appoint" so and so. In other words, taking the two sections of the paragraph together, taking the intention of the framers of this instrument as we know it to be the contemporary literature, by the reports of the convention, we must come to the conclusion it was intended originally that the Senate should be consulted at every stage of the proceeding, not only in the confirmation or ratification, but also in the negotiation of a treaty.

And with that impression upon the minds of George Washington and the other early Presidents, it was quite common for them, as was stated here yesterday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] very clearly, to consult the Senate to see whether it would be advisable—not constitutional, but advisable and politic—to open negotiations with certain nations upon certain subjects. That fell into disuse, and according to the text of the Constitution and the practice, I am not disposed to dispute the power of the President—that is, his authority under the Constitution—to make treaties. Whether they are wise or unwise must be determined by the Senate.

But, Mr. President, there is a grave question about the policy and advisability of mixing up in the political affairs of another hemisphere from which there can come no good to this people, and where we may incur obligations such as we did incur once and which we freely repudiated, not perhaps to our honor, but from an overwhelming public necessity, and in the days of George Washington.

Now, Mr. President, what may be the effect of the conference at Algeciras no man here can say. There is a condition there familiar, I presume, to almost every member of the Senate; of course more so to some, who are students, than to others who are more active in the routine business of the Senate. But the fact remains patent to everybody that the Moroccan question is likely to be a bone of contention that will probably involve the whole of Europe in war. We know that the French have established their sphere of influence in Morocco after years of active diplomatic and commercial intercourse; and as Japan and Russia went to war—one for her predominance in Manchuria and the other in a contention for the sphere of influence in Korea—so to-day we have imminent a war between Germany and France, which may draw in Great Britain on the one side and Italy on the other, and we know not what other power. It is not desired, I presume, by the President of the United States or his advisers, or anybody else, that we should see another war.

Now, wars sometimes do act beneficially, like burning out a bad chimney; but, altogether, we are a people of peace. We want quiet and business, and it is a singular thing that everybody else wants business. All the wars, except the religious wars, have been about commerce, money-making, money getting; and some of the most nefarious crimes which have been committed by some of the greatest nations in the world were for the sake of money—to compel countries to receive goods which in the highest degree were deleterious to their people.

Now, in case there shall be a war as a result of this conference, a bad feeling, are we to take our share of it? How shall our representatives vote? They will not retire when the time comes for casting the vote of the United States. I do not apprehend the President of the United States will send them any such cablegram as to retire while the balloting is going on. He intends them to be there as a potent factor in this conference and in its decision, and on whichever side we cast the deciding ballot or any ballot, we have at once incurred the dislike of those against whom that vote has been cast.

To-day we are on good terms with the whole of Europe, so far as I know. There is nothing I know of to break that good feeling, and certainly the condition of the American foreign trade, which amounts to $2,480,000,000, does not justify the business interests of this country in upholding any policy that invites dissension with foreign nations who are our customers and friends.

However, so far as our business with Morocco is concerned, it amounts to nothing. We have never tried to get it. The whole coast of Africa has been surrendered to a few manufacturers at Marseilles and Lisbon, and although it is true, as I have been informed by American manufacturers, that the Americans could introduce American manufactures along the twenty-six hundred miles of the Mediterranean cheaper than the manufacturers of Lisbon, we have not invaded that field at all. Why? For lack of enterprise? For lack of drummers who can speak two languages? No. Simply because the American manufacturer has relied upon a protective tariff to take care of him and has not put himself on his wit to compete with his compeers in all the nations of the world for the cheapest goods in the cheapest market. That is the only reason. You can not find a drummer of an American house who speaks any language but English. The employers do not demand it of them. Nor do our manufacturers trouble themselves to prepare and ship the goods in the way in which the foreign customers want them prepared and shipped. That, however, is not important in this consideration.

The question is whether the President has acted wisely in sending the conferees there, and no one has shown in this debate, unless it was when I was absent from the Chamber, that we are to be in any manner the beneficiaries of this deliberation. That our political interests are not concerned in one single particular, I believe will be conceded by every gentleman on both sides of the Chamber. I can not conceive how they can be concerned; and if that is true, then how much better it would be to cling to the advice of Washington and Jefferson and the other early statesmen of the Republic to have no intercourse, except strictly commercial, with the people of the Old World.

It has been said by my very learned and distinguished friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that there was a strong disposition on this side to preserve the principles of Washington's Farewell Address. I did not look at it in that way. Perhaps he was taking a Pickwickian view of it. The attempt on this side is to honestly maintain the wisdom of taking the advice of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson and of confining our political troubles to this hemisphere as much as we are able to do. What relation we have had, as cited by the learned Senator from Massachusetts, with the Barbary coast, has not been to the honor, but to the everlasting disgrace of the American nation, as it was simply paying a tribute to a nest of pirates. We are too strong now to do that. But that, Mr. President, is one of the matters I shall not dwell upon. I only brought it in because it has been so freely discussed on both sides, with such a variance of opinion.

I wish to speak particularly about Santo Domingo. The President has made utterance in his message, and his friend and fidus Achates has spoken here. The frankness of the President is not to be disputed by anybody. Nobody has ever said that he cultivated diplomatic phrases to conceal his meaning. There is an openness and frankness about his communications, whether official or otherwise, that leaves nobody in doubt about his meaning, and he has stated his reasons for interfering in the affair in Santo Domingo, and that affair, in my opinion, concerns us a great deal more than does the conference at Algeciras. The President of the United States has said that in a wise development or evolution of the Monroe doctrine we were to take care of the people in the island of Santo Domingo—that is, that part of it comprising the Dominican Republic—for the reason that it was near us, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]; for the reason stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in the same way; and for the further reason, produced by both of those gentlemen and by the President, that they are a helpless people, utterly unable to take care of themselves, and that he is justified in interference in behalf of a helpless people, among whom anarchy is a permanent condition, in order to do what? To collect their dues and pay their debts, and relieve them from what? From the threat of occupation of some of their ports by foreign powers.

I do not see that the Monroe doctrine is a doctrine of evolution, wise or otherwise. As the Senator from Massachusetts very correctly stated yesterday, it was a pretty dead doctrine as long as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was extant, for that was a complete check of the Monroe doctrine, both as to the first, second, and third parts of it. It was only after the abolition of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that we had a recrudescence of ideas here, which could not be called the Monroe doctrine, but more properly the great American doctrine that there should be no interference in purely American questions by the nations of Europe.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate or to fatigue myself, but it is impossible for me to discuss the President's position in regard to the Monroe doctrine and that of his champion here on the floor, who has sustained him with great ability and great clearness, without going to the genesis of this business to show what the Monroe doctrine is, for there has been yet, in my hearing, no clear definition of the Monroe doctrine—in fact, no correct statement of what the Monroe doctrine is nor the reason why it ever existed at all.

We recollect that in the general revolt of the Spanish colonies in America the Holy Alliance was formed. There had been a tremendous cataclysm in France, and the Jacquerie had arisen against the governing and richer classes, and there had been a sort of revolution which seemed to satiate itself with nothing else than human blood. In a spasm of "liberty, equality, and fraternity" those people had seemed to send all over Europe the mighty influence of love of liberty, and there were uprisings in Spain, in the Piedmont country, and all over Europe, and the flames, crossing the Atlantic, illumined the Spanish colonies, and they, too, raised the standard of revolt a little later on. The result was to throw off the yoke of Spain after various circumstances of warfare, which culminated in the victory on a field, the name of which I have forgotten, by General San Martin, which virtually, as has been said, closed the war for independence in South America.

At this time the Holy Alliance assembled in congress in Paris and declared through the persons of the monarchs themselves—for no less personage was permitted at that conference—that they ruled by divine right; that no reform in government could possibly originate among the people and go upward, but they must all go down, and that in obedience to the God-given right to reign over other people there was an obligation to the Divinity at the cost of whatever liberty and life might be necessary to establish order on the royal idea of order.

In obedience to that, they sent a hundred thousand troops into Spain, overthrew a constitutional Cortes, restored Ferdinand VII to power, and then overran the Piedmont country and soon suppressed every feeling that seemed to be capable of being incited to rebellion anywhere in Europe. There were conferences at Labach, Trappau, Vienna, Paris, and at one or two other places. The King of England could not be there personally, although he sympathized with them. He could not attend simply because, according to the British constitution, the British sovereign can do nothing. He can only act through a responsible ministry. He had his ambassador at the conference, and the ambassador reported with great satisfaction the progress being made in the scheme of the Holy Alliance. The prime minister was Lord Castlereagh, and then a great man took his place—George Canning. Canning loved liberty, but was also devoted to the commercial interests of Great Britain—a double cause of action. He saw that the return of the Spanish colonies to the sovereignty of Spain would, under Spanish law, deny to Great Britain any share of the commerce of the colonies, and when it was reported by the British ambassador at the last conference that it was contemplated by the Holy Alliance to send a united fleet to South America to restore the sovereignty of Spain, he called into conference Mr. Rush, the American minister near the Court of St. James, and he gave him the plan and sounded him, to use his own expression, to see how he would take the suggestion he was about to offer, saying in a letter to a friend that the American minister not only took it well, but he took the bait, hook, line, sinker, and all, and ran away with the proposition.

He said this is the time for the United States to assert itself against what? The Holy Alliance; against its scheme of government, which denied the right of peoples to govern themselves and affirmed the divine appointment of kings. A declaration by the United States that any attempt of the Holy Alliance upon the liberty of the Spanish-American colonies will be viewed as an unfriendly act by the United States, and will not be tolerated by them; and if events required action by the United States, he assured Mr. Rush that Great Britain could be relied upon to furnish the support of her fleets.

Mr. Rush communicated this very promptly to our Government. Mr. John Quincy Adams, an exceedingly able and energetic man, was Secretary of State. The Secretary drew up in part what is now called the "Monroe doctrine," under the direction of Mr. Monroe. It was submitted to Mr. Jefferson, who retained it about six weeks, and then, without any authority from anybody that I can find, communicated it to Madison, who gave it much milder support than Mr. Jefferson. Then came a conference in the Cabinet. Mr. Monroe, with all his great abilities, was a somewhat timid man—there is no doubt of that, and was perhaps a negative character—and when the debate came in the Cabinet over this document prepared by Mr. John Quincy Adams, Mr. Monroe was a little bit startled by the decision and firmness of the tone of the document. The contest was whether the President should have his phraseology or the Secretary of State should have his; and there is no doubt that the wish of the President would have prevailed but for the fact that a stronger man than either was Secretary of War—John C. Calhoun—who took the part of Mr. John Quincy Adams, and together they drove that thing through the Cabinet.

At the last meeting upon that question, Mr. Adams submitted the last paragraph, which concerned the colonization in this country by foreign nations. That was never considered by the Cabinet. Mr. Calhoun made that statement in the old Senate Chamber on two occasions, once in 1848, on the military occupation of Yucatan, a measure proposed by the Polk Administration, and again in one of his several speeches on the Oregon question, under the Polk Administration; and, by the way, Mr. Polk was an exceedingly aggressive and energetic President. Mr. Adams was present and heard one of these declarations that the Cabinet had not considered the colonization feature, for which Mr. Adams alone was responsible, and did not deny it. On the contrary, you will find in his works that he claimed the credit of having himself written and put through that part concerning colonization.

That part of it was conceived in this way. It was intended to affect in fact only two nations—one was Russia and the other was Great Britain. An American ship captain named Gray, on a little trading ship, had gone up the Columbia River, and as discoverer claimed the whole country in the name of the United States. Fur traders had claimed the whole country in the name of Great Britain, by occupation and in the prosecution of their trade. Russia had extended her forts down to Monterey, in California, claiming the whole northwest coast, and that condition existed when the so-called "doctrine of Monroe" was proclaimed in 1821.

Immediately Great Britain and Russia notified us that no attention would be paid to that clause of the document. The matter was simplified, so far as Russia was concerned, by a treaty which she made with the Republic of Mexico, in which she agreed to retire from all fortifications and occupations, and did retire as far as Alaska. The other was in a condition that required a modus vivendi, and in that condition Mr. Polk declared he was going to the fifty-six forty line or fight, and that became the slogan of his particular followers—"Fifty-six forty or fight." But the matter was arranged by a joint commission upon a division which did not meet the views of Mr. Polk, but it established the present line. A later commission established the main channel of Puget Sound and San Juan de Fuca Straits, which gave the island of Vancouver to Great Britain. And that part of the doctrine has been as dead ever since as the bulrushes that surrounded little Moses on the banks of the Nile. It has been said it was revived in the case of Venezuela. I, for one, did not agree with Mr. Cleveland in his message on the Venezuelan question.

Now, Mr. President, look further and see how far the Monroe doctrine has operated in the other feature of it. The best way to find out what was meant by the doctrine as it was enunciated by Mr. Monroe is to take a contemporary view of it and the action subsequent to that time. My friend the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and I am sorry he is absent to-day, because I like his interruptions very much, as they always spur me up when I am a little flagging, stated that he was for the Monroe doctrine as it was in the beginning and in all the intermediate stages up to date and in all its evolutions and everything else. As a matter of fact, the Monroe doctrine is best interpreted by the man who wrote it—John Quincy Adams—I mean that part of it which is political and concerning the interference of Europeans upon the Western Hemisphere.

Three years after the date of that proclamation, the same gentleman who was then Secretary of State had become President of the United States, and Henry Clay, of Kentucky, had become the Secretary of State, after that notorious quadrangular fight that raised the cry of "Bargain and corruption!" when Jackson, who got the majority of votes, was beaten by the combination. As to whether there was bribery and corruption, of course nobody now thinks there was, but it was the cry then.

On account of this promulgation of the Monroe doctrine, the southern confederacies or republics of America and Central America and Mexico had conceived the idea of a pan-American congress, and they called it to meet at Panama as a central point. The Republics of Mexico and Colombia invited the United States to send delegates to that convention. To that convention, if I am not mistaken, was delegated a man named Andersen, of Kentucky, who was then minister at Bogota. In those days there were no facilities for travel in that country, and he had to hunt for one of the courts of those little republics in the mountains the best way he could, and get away from there the best way he could. The other delegate was Mr. Sargeant, of Pennsylvania. One of these died. The other never went there at all, and because neither of them did appear the Congress at Panama adjourned to meet at Tacubaya, in Mexico. But that meeting was never held.

The most interesting fact, if you wish to know what was the meaning of the Monroe doctrine in regard to the political or other influences on this hemisphere of European powers, is contained in the instructions which the Secretary of State, Mr. Clay, wrote for his chief, John Quincy Adams, the author, in the instructions to Andersen and Sargeant, and also to our ministers near the courts of other nations, particularly Mr. Poinsett, who was then our representative at the city of Mexico. In these instructions this author of the Monroe doctrine, which distinctly stated that any attempt on the part of European governments to invade the rights or use an influence to the detriment of any of these American republics would be considered by the United States as a distinctly unfriendly act to them—they were instructed to say to the Panama Congress that when that utterance was made it did not in any manner whatever commit the United States to interfere, by arms or otherwise, except good offices, if there should be an attempt made by any foreign country to occupy or seize her territory or empire or impair their rights as a sovereign; that it was a declaration of opinion and a policy that each one of these sovereign states should make for themselves, and having made it, maintain it. They distinctly disclaimed the fact that any of the southern nations could call upon the United States in any contingency whatever, and they took occasion to say also, which was true, that as the Holy Alliance had dissolved, as any man could see it must, for when so many people had divine rights they must clash somewhere, owing to this disintegration, the first declaration of these principles, of course, faded because of no importance; because the cause that produced them had disappeared. Mr. Adams, through his Secretary, declared that, the cause of this declaration having passed away, there was no longer any reason for insisting upon the declaration he had made.

Now, that declaration was not against monarchy. This was the first nation in the world to recognize the Emperor of Brazil when, after the insurrection in Portugal, the imperial family moved its court to Rio. And we were the first to recognize Iturbide, Emperor of Mexico. It was not intended or aimed at the system of monarchy in Europe or elsewhere, but the Holy Alliance system, which declared in its fundamental doctrines as a truth that power came only from God to kings, and could not exist inherently among the people governed; otherwise that government was not by the censent of the governed, but by will of the governor. So he said the occasion or the cause having passed away, there was no longer any necessity for considering this doctrine at all.

Then we had the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which involved us in all sorts of difficulties. There is another singular fact which I will call to the attention of the Senate. There never has been, at least not until lately, any legislative approval of the Monroe doctrine. There were attempts made to approve it, but they all failed. There were resolutions in both Houses of Congress supporting President Monroe in his declaration of that doctrine. Not one of them ever passed. As a matter of fact, the authors never had tried to call them up for consideration.

But I will tell you what did pass. A resolution written by James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, then a Member of the House, repudiating the whole thing. It did pass, by a very decided majority, the House of Representatives. So the only legislative action taken was a distinct and emphatic repudiation of the doctrine of Mr. Monroe as declared in his message of December 2, 1821.

As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said yesterday, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty seemed to hold us to the fence, and we were not willing even to properly interpret the Clayton-Bulwer treaty on account of the consequences that would flow from it. When we failed to agree with Great Britain upon the main meaning of that treaty our negotiator, the Secretary, Mr. Clayton, wrote a note, as did Sir Henry Bulwer Lytton, in which they agreed that the British meaning was the right meaning and that our meaning was wrong, and immediately the Senate, with General Cass leading, and supported by Stephen A. Douglas, declared in the Senate that they would never have voted for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty if they had understood it as having that meaning.

I may be allowed to bring in a little episode also to show that the denunciation of Mr. Clayton was violent on the part of Mr. Cass and Mr. Douglas and others. He resigned his seat as Secretary and came here as a Senator in order to meet Mr. Cass. Mr. Cass, with a discretion much greater than his valor, found it convenient to be absent that winter in Detroit. Mr. Clayton, who was a distinguished debater and a very fierce one, finding nobody else to talk with, after fuming and fretting with his manuscript here for two or three months said that as the man he was after was gone he would have to take up his lieutenant; and so he proceeded to castigate Stephen A. Douglas, with the result that when he concluded Stephen A. Douglas rose, and when he got through there was not anything left of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or of Clayton either.

Now, having differed in the construction of that instrument and suspended the Monroe doctrine, Great Britain proposed first that we should arbitrate. The Senate declined to do it. Then there was another proposition that we should abolish the treaty. That was also declined. Then there was another proposition that we should remake the treaty, and that was declined by the Senate. Why? Because then Great Britain had sent Sir William Gore Ouseley to Central America and was negotiating treaties with them extending, as we feared, the sphere of British influence, and it was the fear of those treaties which made the American Senate insist upon the maintenance of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, of which they did not like a line, for fear that greater advantage might accrue to Great Britain from the treaties about to be negotiated. As a matter of fact, it turned out that Sir William Gore Ouseley surrendered every point of contention between the United States and Great Britain, and he made treaties with those little Republics—Nicaragua, Guatemala, Honduras, and so on.

Then, Mr. President and Senators, we have no Monroe doctrine down to the point that it was disengaged from the incubus of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It sprang into sudden popularity because it struck a responsive chord in the bosom of the average American citizen; that is, a desire for military glory and for conquest and for self-assertion. It is one of the curious facts of history that perhaps where men are supposed to govern themselves they are fonder of military glory than the people in monarchies, where, it is declared by Montesquieu in his Spirit of Laws, honor is the motive of action. But that is a fact, if history does not belie itself.

So that martial spirit that is dominant all the time in the American breast has come spontaneously forward to support any measures of aggression, whether wise or unwise, to support any policy, whether just or unjust. I do not mean to say that I am reflecting upon what I consider the greatest people who have ever in all the tide of time essayed the great experiment of self-government; but it is simply a part and parcel of that blood that forces itself through the average American citizen to take all he can; in other words, to adopt—

* * * the good old rule,
* * * the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.

That is not to become the supreme law in this country if we could govern ourselves, but we do maintain it as to other people.

Now, then, the doctrine grew in favor again, not the Monroe doctrine, which had long, long since died and been buried by its authors, but the new American doctrine, that we would not permit in this hemisphere the intrusion of a foreign influence; that the United States, by virtue of its power, by virtue of its political institutions, which are best adapted to secure the rights of men, should have the hegemony of all the American States and should hold itself as a bulwark to protect the weak. That doctrine does not belong to Mr. Monroe or his advisers. It is the feeling of the American people, and it is the dominant policy to-day.

Now, to get down to Santo Domingo, having stated this much by way of introduction, and on account of what the President says, that under the signification of the Monroe doctrine, as it has wisely been evolved, the duty is incumbent upon the American people to protect the people who are in danger of intrusion from some foreign power to compel the payment of debts. As a matter of international law I suppose everyone will admit that the right of a nation to enforce a contractual obligation by arms is conceded. It has always been conceded. It has always been the practice of nations. If you go farther backward, to the history of the Greeks or any other people who have a history, you will find that everywhere they enforced the obligations made to their own people by another power or the citizens of another power.

So we set ourselves up, then, according to the President's idea, to protect these people from seizure—at least in their custom-houses or ports, coming down to the real matter in controversy—by first undertaking to take charge of their whole affairs and guaranteeing their territorial and political integrity, to collect their dues of every kind as they may accrue, and at the same time by a partition of the revenues so collected to pay off gradually or amortize their debts.

Mr. President, I deny that it is the Monroe doctrine or any doctrine of good policy; and I do not wish to be considered as impeaching the wisdom of the distinguished President of the United States or his distinguished Secretary of State. I am discussing this thing deliberately and coolly in the Senate of the United States, interested a great deal more in the welfare of the country than I am in the preservation of the rights of the Senate, although one, in my opinion, is a great deal involved in the other, for whenever the Senate, which the eloquent Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said yesterday was the last refuge of free speech, in the legislative deliberation of this great Government, shall begin to give away its power, its authority, derived from the Constitution, it is but the beginning of the end. We can do no higher duty to our constituents, to this great superstructure, magnificent in its proportions, erected upon the blood and bones of our ancestors for the exercise of the right of self-government by the people of this great country. If this bulwark shall fall where will be the barricade that protects the people from the invasion of Executive aggression?

Now, it is said we need not fear the President, and we had the very great assurance, which was exceedingly comfortable to me, made yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts that we could certainly trust the present President of the United States. I do not believe that the Senator from Massachusetts said that upon the idea that the king can do no wrong, but simply upon his utmost faith in the ability and good intention of the President of the United States.

Mr. President, I am not questioning the good intention of the President of the United States, but we have it from a pretty old authority that "The way to hell is paved with good intentions." I am concerned with results and not with processes. What are the people of this country to receive as the consequences of these acts of the Executive?

We will suppose it is true, as the gentleman says, but this thing will keep piling up and take the form almost of delegated authority of the Constitution—the authorization to do something just like it. You can keep on piling up one precedent upon another until it takes at last the place of principle as well as policy.

We will have a time probably when there will be a change of Presidents. We had the other assurance yesterday—I do not know whether it was intended as a threat or not on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts—that the President would not be a candidate for reelection.

For he himself hath said it,
And it's greatly to his credit—

And so forth, quoting the language of Pinafore.

Mr. President, we are safe now. We do not know that we will be safe hereafter. There may come a time, the Senator will admit, that when, instead of having as President a cool, dispassionate, even-tempered, logical, thinking man, we may have a hot-headed, impulsive, emotional creature in the White House. Instead of a man who, as the present President does, respects the Constitution, as we are informed by the Senator from Massachusetts—and I am very happy, indeed, to get the information—and who regards the law—and I am very glad to know that—we may have a man who will say that he has violated the law because, in his judgment, it is better to do something else. It is possible we may have such a President as that, because we can not go on as now in perpetuo. This is not Mexico. There may be a little over-lord or a little war-lord business going on. There is no perpetual President here, no American Diaz, and there never will be, I reckon. So there must be a change, and instead of this ark of safety, which we have to-day, this President whom we can safely trust, according to the Senator from Massachusetts, who never could violate the Constitution and disrespect the laws, we may have a man who imagines he is doing the very wisest and best thing in the world by upsetting the law and substituting his own judgment. It would occur, of course, to the average mind that the reason why we have law, either fundamental or statutory, is to prevent some Executive from substituting his judgment for the law.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate I will say that I do not anticipate very much discussion on the bill upon the Republican side of the Chamber. On Monday next I will take occasion to offer some amendments to the bill and will make a brief reply to the very able speech of the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. I expect to be followed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and possibly brief speeches may be made by two or three other Senators on this side of the Chamber. I make this observation in the hope that other Senators who may be opposed to some provisions of the bill or to the bill as an entirety may follow, and that its consideration may go along with reasonable rapidity. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

BILLINGS LAND DISTRICT, MONTANA.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] desires to bring a bill before the Senate, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. CARTER. I report back from the Committee on Public Lands, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 8994) to provide for a land district in Yellowstone, Carbon, and Rosebud counties, in the State of Montana, to be known as the "Billings land district." This bill was received by the Senate on the 24th instant and is identical with the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands now on the Calender. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARTER. I move that Order of Business 112, being the bill (S. 540) to establish an additional land district in the State of Montana, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

MOROCCAN CONFERENCE AND RELATIONS WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, resuming the consideration of the matter of Santo Domingo, it may be said very safely that the President of the United States has a right to negotiate a treaty. The policy of it may be as rightly contested. The question of the Santo Domingo treaty can not now be discussed except in the way that it has been; that is, in a skirmish along the outside. But there is a question that can be discussed openly and that is the authority, as distinguished from the word "right" in strict meaning, of the President to carry into operation a treaty negotiated but failing of ratification. I can not subscribe to the language of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that we declined to ratify it, because the record does not show that we declined, but we simply failed to ratify it.

The President says in his message that he is now operating under an agreement with Morales, and he felicitates the country that on account of his action, the President's action, maintaining a force in the island, designating a collector of customs, the island is enjoying a season of unusual prosperity and there is no sign of disturbance. It was an early boast, and the ink was hardly dry before Morales had taken to the woods and another revolution put Caceres in power. There have been twenty-four presidents and only one was ever elected. As I said a while ago, there is a permanent anarchy there, and it is a condition that will exist in spite of everything that can be done by the United States. We may collect all their dues and all their taxes and pay every debt they owe and launch them into the business of governing themselves again, but it will be a flat failure, because of the inherent incapacity of the people for government. This is a fact which President Morales himself admitted to a number of Representatives of the House who were down there last summer, he urging our aid, "Because you see, gentlemen," he said, "we are incapable of maintaining self-government." But the question is now whether the President can make such an agreement. I wish to refer to what we were told by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I am very sorry he is absent to-day. I told him I was going to make a speech and wanted him to be present, not only to give me the pleasure of his countenance, but that I might have the profit of his interruption.

He said the President was bound to maintain the status quo of a treaty pending and not yet concluded by the Senate. I fail to find the authority for that declaration anywhere. There may be, for I must say I have not looked for it lately.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I can point the Senator to one instance.

Mr. MONEY. I shall be very glad to get it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If my recollection serves, the treaty between this country and Great Britain with reference to the naval armament of both countries on the Great Lakes after the war of 1812 was acted upon for a year before the treaty was ratified.

Mr. MONEY. That has happened sometimes by the consent of both parties, I will admit that, when it is really carrying out the treaty. I can recollect an instance when it did.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will state to the Senator, without wishing to interrupt him——

Mr. MONEY. Go ahead.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator merely called for a citation. That, of course, concerned a tremendously grave question of national policy and has affected the relations between this country and Great Britain ever since, because at that time it was proposed not only to largely fortify the coasts but to maintain an armament upon the Great Lakes.

Mr. MONEY. I understand it, and I am obliged to the Senator for reviving my recollection. Since he has done so I can recall another instance, and these two exceptions but verify and establish the rule. I can recollect now another instance, where Russia, Austria, Prussia, and Great Britain had a convention with Turkey concerning the internal affairs of the Ottoman Empire—in 1840, I think it was—and they came to a conclusion, and it was immediately put into effect before a notification even was made to the respective powers that a treaty had been made. But that was on account of the emergency of the circumstances and the fact that communication was so slow at that date it was considered best for the parties that it should be put in operation; and, in fact, every plenipotentiary at that meeting had secret instructions to agree to the immediate operation. However, all these things but prove that the rule is the other way. There are exceptions, and I am very glad the Senator reminded me of this one. I recollect now also the other. One thing brings up another. But I add this fact, however, that this treaty had been before the Senate and the Senate had failed to ratify it. Now, in that condition of things the President goes on to put the treaty in operation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. MONEY. It is all right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly. I am glad to be interrupted.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It would be more correct to say that the treaty is still under consideration in the Senate; not that the Senate failed to ratify the treaty, but that the treaty is still under consideration, because the expression, "The Senate has failed to ratify the treaty" seems to indicate that the Senate had taken adverse action upon it.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator did not understand me; that is all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, then, I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. What I said was, "That the one put in operation had failed." After the meeting of this Congress it was sent again to the Senate, having been extended, I suppose, by the consent of both the parties concerned.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will excuse me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. It was not sent again to the Senate. It remained here in the Senate.

Mr. MONEY. Then it had failed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was the same treaty.

Mr. LODGE. It failed to secure ratification and was pending before the Senate.

Mr. MONEY. It failed to secure ratification, and the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin is—and, I presume, of the Senator from Massachusetts, too, and probably of my distinguished young friend from Indiana—will be that he had the right to maintain the status quo in Santo Domingo.

Mr. President, in the first place, there is so much to be said upon the advisability of the thing as a whole that it does not seem to me the right existed in the President to carry into effect a treaty that was not ratified. That is exactly what he has done. He has been maintaining the status quo. I make that assertion, and it can not be contradicted, I think. The President has not simply maintained the status quo. The President has gone on just as steadily as though the Senate had unanimously voted for the treaty, and has carried into operation every solitary item of it as far as he was called upon to do. When Morales fled to the woods after the fight in that country the time had come for a political convulsion. They have them there like chills and fevers. It is periodic. When Morales went to the woods the treaty went right along with the incoming Government.

We had here an important witness, from whom the Senator from Wisconsin was reading the other day. I did not know that his testimony had been made public, because I had been sick three or four weeks, but I presume from his reading from it that the bar of secrecy had been removed. This is the only witness who ever came here that I know of, and he testified most positively that he was not collecting customs on account of any treaty whatever, but that he was collecting customs on that little island and depositing 45 per cent of the gross income of the Government for its administrative expenses, and the other 55 per cent in a bank at New York, from which it can be drawn only by a check signed by the President of the Dominican Republic and countersigned by Colonel Colton, the agent. So it can be said in one sense it is not the money of anybody. But he said, "I am acting under a decree." The President said he was acting under an agreement, and the collector of customs said he was acting under a decree of Morales, and that decree was pronounced by Morales without the consent of anybody—his cabinet or his congress. He undertook to misapply the words "modus vivendi." I do not know, I only suppose, that he was ignorant of the fact that a modus vivendi requires two contracting parties and merely provides for a temporary arrangement pending negotiations for a permanent one. But this single individual issued his decree—or he calls it "modus vivendi"—that he has declared, not he and the President of the United States, but that he has declared to the United States, and the President of the United States, in obedience to the decree of that mulatto President, designates a man to collect the customs who is borne upon the civil roster of the United States and is now absent indefinitely with leave without pay; and then it is said by the Senator that there is another one so designated. That is a mistake. The other one was appointed by Colonel Colton himself, without consulting anybody, and he, too, is on the civil roster and is indefinitely on leave without pay. So they are operating under a decree of Morales, I suppose assumed by his successor in office, as under power and authority entitled, etc.

That is the condition of things according to that witness, and I take it the President means what he says, and knows as well as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], or Colonel Colton, or as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] knows, what he meant. What he said in the message is plain reading—that he is living up to the agreement. The facts show that he is absolutely carrying out in every particular the terms and specifications of a treaty which the Senate failed to ratify; and I deny the power of the President to do that. I would not care how desirable it might be, how salutary it might be, or how promotive of the interest of that little Republic or of this great Republic it might be, I deny the power and the authority of the President to do anything of the sort.

Suppose that this Senate, in this session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, should also fail to ratify that treaty; what is going to be done then? The President will continue acting under the agreement, I suppose, carrying out the treaty, while we did not ratify any treaty; and so the ratifying power of the Senate becomes an absolutely useless appendage to the Government so far as treaties go, if this can be allowed to go on without question.

The President of the United States, or the Secretary of State, or whoever else is responsible—though I should hold the President responsible, because he is the Executive head of the Government; he is really at the head of every one of the Executive Departments of the Government, and he is just as much at the head of the State Department as is the Secretary of State, and is responsible for it all—I say that the President has not any right to carry out that treaty, which has been declined ratification by this Senate, and as the Senate had full power and full opportunity to consider it, and did consider it, its failure to ratify it might very properly be considered by the President as a rejection, so far as his action was concerned in carrying it into operation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I were to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Mississippi is discussing a very practical question, and I am listening with great attention; but I wish to ask the Senator what he would have the President do, under the present circumstances, with reference to the money already collected?

Mr. MONEY. I will answer that question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to have an answer.

Mr. MONEY. So far as I know, the President has nothing on God's earth to do with the money, and never did have, and never proposed to have. There is no agreement, there is no treaty, and there is no decree that ever gave him any control of it whatever.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Suppose Colonel Colton were withdrawn and restored to his duties in the Philippines, and what the Senator is now describing as occurring under a modus vivendi should stop just now, to-day, what would occur?

Mr. MONEY. That may be a question of some interest to the Senator from Indiana, but it is not of the slightest concern to me. I do not care what becomes of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is just the point.

Mr. MONEY. Not at all, according to my view.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What would happen? I suppose the Senator would admit that this money, if returned to the island, would at once be seized upon by a foreign power or by any temporary government that might there exist. In either event, with respect to the island and to American interests there—supposing that to be the case and the treaty came to a vote in executive session of the Senate and we should ratify the treaty, then where would we be?

Mr. MONEY. That may concern the Senator from Indiana, but is not of the slightest concern on earth to me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

Mr. MONEY. Not the slightest on earth. I do not see why we should have so much concern about the debts of that Republic, every one of which was incurred in promoting and carrying through a revolution.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But I ask the Senator what would happen if we should ratify the treaty?

Mr. MONEY. But we will not ratify the treaty; it is idle to suppose that. I do not think we shall.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But the Senator can not assume that we are not going to ratify it.

Mr. MONEY. I do not know about that. It will depend on Senators on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We may reject the treaty or we may ratify it.

Mr. MONEY. We may have a lucid interval and reject it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I repeat, we may reject or we may ratify it when it comes before the Senate in executive session. If what the Senator supposes is carried into effect, and afterwards we were to ratify the treaty, in what condition should we be left?

Mr. MONEY. That is the third time the Senator has asked the same question, and I answer it for the third time and say I do not care a continental what becomes of it, and I do not see why any American Senator, as a Senator, should be concerned about it, either.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator thinks that is a sufficient answer?

Mr. MONEY. If there is an American gentleman here who has got a pecuniary interest in it, he might inquire as to what would become of it; but I am only interested here about passing on the treaty. The disposition of the money is of the least concern. Whether it be three or four hundred thousand or a million dollars, it belongs to the little Republic in the West Indies. I do not think that is any matter of concern to us. It is too small a game; we are not hunting with bird shot. I will tell you what Colonel Colton says about it, if you would like to know. He says that Morales can not draw that money unless he countersigns the check and that he—Colton—can not draw it at all, and that the money is to be distributed as prescribed in the decree or in the treaty, for they are just the same.

Colonel Colton impressed me, as I believe he did the entire committee, as being a very capable and honest man, that would do his duty as he believed it to be assigned to him. There was nothing of dodging or equivocation or concealment about his statement. He was just as plain and open as the day, and I do not think there is a member of the committee who does not believe that Colonel Colton is going to do what he is told to do; but Colonel Colton said he was there under the decree of Morales; he was there to obey Morales; but he was designated by the President of the United States for the place by the decree of Morales. He also said that he appointed his assistants without the consent of Morales or of the President of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MONEY. Of course I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. It just occurred to me that Colonel Colton thinks his signature is necessary to get this money.

Mr. MONEY. That is true.

Mr. TILLMAN. No doubt that is the arrangement announced, and that Morales's signature is necessary to get the money; but Morales is no longer in Santo Domingo. He is in San Juan, P. R., or somewhere else, and now we have got to get up another modus vivendi to get that money.

Mr. LODGE. It is not Morales personally, but the President of the Dominican Republic, whoever he may be.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; that is not the arrangement. That is not what the President says. He says that President Morales is the man with whom he dealt.

Mr. MONEY. I must insist, Mr. President, that if any controversy is to go on I must be a party to it, as this comes out of my time. I do not want any controversy to go on whilst I hold the floor, unless it is directed to me. Senators may talk to me or to the Senate, but they can not talk over my shoulder.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can not be interrupted except with his consent.

Mr. MONEY. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted. I do not see any reason why a man should decline to be interrupted if he knows what he is talking about, and I think I do. I feel greatly obliged sometimes for an interruption. It is like winding up a watch which is partially run down. Everybody knows how wholesome it is to be interrupted with questions. It is only troublesome when a man does not know what he is talking about to submit to interruptions, and when I do not know enough in relation to a subject to submit to interruptions I will stop talking at all. I want my young friend from Indiana to consider that he may interrupt me just as many times as he wants to.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. I say the President of the United States is really carrying out the treaty which this Senate has failed—I used the mildest word possible—to ratify, and that he has no authority whatever to do it, and nobody, I will venture to say, can successfully contend that he has. It is not a question whether it is desirable that this thing shall be done. It is totally dissociated from that question, absolutely differentiated. That is another question, or, as Rudyard Kipling would say, "That is another story;" but I think I can get to that probably after a while, if I have time.

But the point I am coming to now is that we are in this condition, that the President of the United States is carrying out a treaty which has never been ratified. If he can do that in one instance, he can do it in another; if he can do it in another one, he can do it in five hundred, and the effect will be that he need not pay any attention whatever to the Senate in the matter of treaties.

In this matter the President is moved by motives of great humanity. He said a year or two ago, and I think he said it more recently, in the fullness of his goodness and kind intentions toward the smaller and weaker nations on this hemisphere, that if they would be good—that is, if they would be orderly and pay their debts and not revolutionize more than once or twice a year—"not loosing the bands of civilization," I think, was one of his choice expressions, which I admired very much at the time—we could be very helpful to them. I do not know what he meant by "we"—he and the Senate or he and the Congress of the United States of America or the American nation or simply Theodore Roosevelt—the imperial "we"—I do not know. But if they did not behave in that way, there was no telling what would happen.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], whose absence I must continue to deplore, happily got off in praise of the President about the treaty that was recently made by the great contending powers in Asia, that at the psychological moment the President said "Let there be peace," and there was peace. I suppose the President is carrying the psychological moment around with him in his vest pocket; and in any time of any little trouble he has always got that psychological moment.

I should like to know, digressing a little now, when that psychological moment came into the discussion. Here were two great nations at war. They had exhausted themselves; they had no resources; they were lying still, looking askance at one another on the plains of Manchuria. They had to have peace. There was no court in Europe at which Japan was willing to hold a conference, except Great Britain, and that one Russia would not have. There was not a court in Asia, because the only one there was dominated by Japan, and, therefore, Russia would not consider that. There was but one spot on the globe to come to, and that was the United States of America, "the land of the free and the home of the brave," where everybody is at home. The President treated them like a gentleman, and they enjoyed the hospitality of this country. They held their meetings here and a treaty of peace was negotiated because of their necessities, not on account of anybody's psychological moment. On the contrary, if we can believe the newspapers—and some people do not—it was stated that every proposition made by the President was flatly and absolutely rejected by the Czar—I am using the literal language now of the Czar as reported in a dispatch from St. Petersburg—and the Mikado, in politer manner, said he had already arranged the terms upon which the treaty would be made, politely intimating that no suggestions were wanted. I do not know when the psychological moment came. That was a business proposition; and every one of the propositions made by the President was absolutely and flatly rejected by one of the parties, and the other paid no attention to them.

Sometimes it is a good thing to give a man praise when he does not get much of it; and our President, I think, needs all he can get. He is not likely to be carried away, or his head made to swim, with adulation or anything of that sort. He can preserve his equanimity and his judgment notwithstanding. So I am willing for all that to go.

Now, Mr. President, I want somebody to show me how the President has authority to carry into effect a treaty that has never been ratified by the Senate; and the shuffler of the cards can not disguise plain facts. You may call it, as the President does, an agreement. You can call it, as the Senator from Wisconsin does, a maintenance of the status quo pending the conclusion of the negotiation for a treaty, or you can call it, as Colonel Colton says, a decree of Morales; but the effect is just exactly the same. The American peple to-day are being taxed to support a fleet there, a part of which, I understand, is to be withdrawn. I make no objection to the presence of the fleet, because it is afloat and it has got to cruise somewhere, and it may just as well cruise in American waters as in some other waters. I am going now outside of that question to take up the other one, with the indulgence of the Senate, and that is the utility of this business.

What is the history of this island republic? You recollect that in the delirium of intoxication into which the first draft of freedom threw the whole French people, when they not only desired liberty more than anybody else on earth, but had it, the French nation resolved itself into a vast propaganda, with the torch of liberty lighted at the foot of the guillotine, wet with the noblest blood of France, and sent it out to light the sacred fires of liberty in other countries. Then, in that spasm of generosity, they said to these people, or the French part of them:

> Take your island, full of magnificent harbors, with the best old Roman ways since Appius Claudius, with your fine mills and plantation houses, with your splendid docks and wharves, with your hills full of precious metals, with the finest woods in the world, the home of the sugar cane and rice—take it all, with your refined French civilization and the French language, the politest in the world.

So they gave it to them; but when the spasm was passed a man came to the head of affairs—Napoleon Bonaparte. He sent his General Leclerc to Santo Domingo to subdue the people there, who were not doing well. The first thing they had was a massacre of every white person on the island, men, women, and children, and next a massacre of the mulattoes.

Liberty meant license to those people. They fought the French, who, deciminated by fever, were withdrawn. The game was not worth the candle. Toussaint L'Ouverture, who was a humane and able colored man, the head of the revolutionary party, never has been held in respect by his own people, however, because he was not a "strong man;" he did not shoot everybody that was opposed to him, and therefore he was a weak man and never held in esteem, although he has been held in respect by the world.

Dessalines, the most atrocious monster recorded in history, who shot thousands of his political opponents, has the singular honor of having his birthday a national holiday, because he was a "strong man," who never hesitated at any crime.

Then the other part of the island joined the revolutionists. That part of the island was Spanish, but they were all freed together. They rose also; and that condition of things continued until 1840, when, after a series of little revolutions and uprisings, Santo Domingo achieved her independence from Haiti, and after running themselves along for twenty-one years, their President being overthrown, they voluntarily threw themselves back into the hands of Spain, feeling their helplessness, just as they manifest to-day their incapacity to take care of themselves. It reminds us of the frogs who prayed Jupiter for a king, and he gave them a log. They soon despised the inertness of King Log and prayed Jupiter for another king, and he sent them a stork, who devoured them.

The Spaniards grossly disregarded their agreement with the people, and in 1865 they again arose and the Spanish troops were driven out. Again the game was not worth the candle. Since that time they have elected but one out of twenty-four Presidents, showing in every single act an absolute incapacity to conceive, to maintain, to operate, or to defend self-governing institutions, and a capacity to continue in debt.

This great debt was taken up by an improvement company, whose claim was investigated by my distinguished friend Judge Gray, formerly a member of this body, and John Bassett Moore, very strong authorities. I think there was an award made in favor of the improvement company, and I am reminded here that New Jersey granted a charter to the railroad company that was an allied concern, associated in interest.

These people have shown this incapacity all the time, and these expenses have been incurred to pay off the revolutionists. It has been to revolutions that the revenue has been applied. You issue your pronounciamento, collect your regiment of ragamuffins, let them go where they will be "well peppered," as Falstaff said at the Shrewsbury fight, seize the custom-houses, and what is the result? You are the de factos. You seize everything and you pay off the troops. If you can not pay the revolutionists, how can you have a revolution? They take a material point of view of these movements down there. Even if we thought it worth while to interfere with such paltry concerns as that, it is none of our business. It is foreign to any power granted to any branch of this great Government, when the people gave it to us in convention, that we should go off and meddle in affairs of that sort that concern us not one particle in the world.

Suppose we set them on their feet, paid their debts, put everything in liquidation, and a wholesome revenue law was enacted and being operated all the time, do you think that it would be six months, after a thousand dollars got in the treasury, before there would be a revolution to get it? Those people can not govern themselves. Why expect impossibilities of anybody? The history of that race all over the globe has shown that they are absolutely incapable of self-government. There is not a man, I think, on the other side of the Chamber or a man on this side who does not recognize that; there is not a man anywhere who does not know it; and why should we shut our eyes to the facts because of any local political consideration?

Take the history of the race. Africa, according to the testimony of the rocks, is said by geologists to be the oldest continent, and they may be presumed to be among the oldest of the races of mankind. They have never risen to the dignity of a legislative council or a judiciary tribunal. They know no authority but that of the strong arm and the heavy club. These people would certainly relapse; and relapse means that this temporary occupation would become permanent occupation, permanent control, permanent management.

I was delighted to hear my learned friend, a great Senator and a great historian combined, Mr. LODGE, say yesterday that he never would agree to annexation. I suppose he made that remark, in the first place, because he honestly meant it, and I believe he does honestly mean it; and, in the second place, because there has been so much asserted in the newspapers that that would be the result, that with occupation was meant at last annexation, not with the full privilege of citizenship, but annexation after the Filipino fashion, a people whom this body has solemnly declared shall never become citizens of the United States and that their territory shall never be a part of the territory of the United States—a very whimsical sort of a declaration for the Senate of the United States, but it is yet unrepealed. True, it is an expression of opinion, but what an opinion! We do not want them under such terms as that, nor do we want them at all. The trouble with us is, we are overloaded. We do not want any more islands; we do not want any more inferior people; we want to shake off the shackles that bind us in the race for independent government.

I tell you, Senators, there is not a body of white men on top of this globe that can successfully maintain self-government with its body politic and its power of self-government weakened by the infusion of so much incompetency and incapacity for government as there is in this country, unless some measure is carried through Congress to relieve us to a great extent. We do not want any more, and if to-day the United States would relinquish her hold upon every island in the sea, she would come out of it immeasurably stronger than she is to-day, and she would relieve herself of a thousand annoyances, a thousand cares, and a thousand dangers, and would become so immeasurably strong that she would be too invulnerable to invite attack by any combination of nations on the face of this globe. But the time has come for colonization and conquest, for the extension and amplification of power. Just ten years ago this month I had the honor to speak for ten minutes before the legislature of the State of Mississippi, and I recollect distinctly that I made the statement that we were now about to totally change the nature of our foreign relations; that instead of staying at home and attending to our own affairs, as we had been advised to do by Washington, we were about to go abroad and attend to the affairs of other people, and that we were about to become a colonizing and conquering people. I am not a prophet, but there is something in the trend of events and in the changes of temperament of the people, modified and qualified by successes and vicissitudes and everthing of that sort, that I thought I saw it clear enough; and it was clear enough as it happened.

I say if this continues we will reach a condition after a while when we will sink by our own weight unless we discard this form of government. We have got a right to do that. There is nothing in the world to keep us from discarding this bunglesome sort of government. Our friend from Wisconsin said we were neither a hermit nor a baby nation. I do not know that anybody has ever said that we are; but the intimation, I think, was that we were getting too big for the clothes of the Constitution; and I have heard it very frequently said—I have heard it in this body, and I heard it said the other day by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin—that we had inherent rights as a government. I deny any such thing as that. That is a rank heresy in this Republic. There are no inherent rights in anybody; there are nothing but delegated rights, and yet we are as great as any nation. Of course we are as a nation; as a government, no. Is the Government a good one? We think it the best in the world; but the testimony of civilization is that it is a bad Government. Why? Not because its theory is too bad, but because it is too good for practical use. The best evidence that they think it bad is that nobody imitates it; there is nobody like us or likely to be. I say we can change it whenever we get tired of it, and we are getting tired of it. There is no use ignoring the dangers; there is no use in talking platitudes. I am going to stand by the delegated authority conferred upon the three branches of the Government by the Constitution until that Constitution has expired by substitution of another. The American people are great. They have got all the inherent powers that belong to any nation in the world. Of course all nations have. It is not a question; it is not a matter of hearsay. It is something we know.

The Government of the United States is not the American nation. It is simply a form of government which the American nation has instituted here for their own self-government; and while this nation has all the power that can be exercised by any other nation, the Government has not that power. Whenever the American people get tired of this government by the Constitution, they will get rid of it. The shortest way is by three-fourths of the States agreeing to call a convention. When they meet, the first law to pass will be that "the present form of government is hereby abrogated." That settles the whole matter. Then you can set up a king here; you can set up an oligarchy, a money oligarchy, but not an aristocracy, for we have not got the material for that; but you can set up an oligarchy; you can put up a Council of Ten after the fashion of Venice; you can have a limited or an absolute monarchy; you can have whatever form of government the people want. Every people in the world have exactly that government which they ought to have. Governments are what the people make them. I do not care how bad they may be, governments are what the people make them. If you want to get a good government, you have to get good people who can appreciate the blessings of freedom.

We are not trying this for the first time. This thing has been fought over from the remotest annals of human history. People more public-spirited than we are, more devoted to their country, and more full of patriotism, and not so selfish—although it is true they were selfish as we are in fact—have tried it.

Senators, when I consider the history of the human race and see the successive rise and fall of peoples and nations and governments, I think at last that we are running in a vast cycle, in which the same things are constantly recurring under different names and in different places perhaps. It is simply history repeating itself all the time. We think we are in a time now of great commercial sordidness, avarice, greed, and all that sort of thing, and the country resounds with declamations and invectives and objurgations against the spirit of greed and plunder, which, if continued, will undermine our free institutions. That has been going on ever since there was a government. Bribing, stuffing of ballot-boxes, money for everything.

I can recall, and I suppose many others here can, one of those admirable comedies of Aristophanes, written four hundred and fifty years before the birth of Christ, when Bacchus was going down to hell to get a poet, all of the good ones being dead and none living except a lot of scribblers in whom he had no confidence. The good ones were all in hell. He went to the house of Hercules and inquired the way. He was told, "You proceed on this road to a lake, vast and bottomless, and there you will find an old fellow, Charon, who has a boat and will ferry you across, but he will charge you two oboli." Bacchus said: "Two oboli! Then they will not let you go to hell unless you pay the fare!" [Laughter.] "Well," he said, "that is rather astonishing. By the way, I have been going around on the earth trying to find a poet. I notice that everywhere you go you have to have the oboli. You can not get on without them. Nobody will do anything for you without them. Who in the deuce introduced this thing?" "A man named Theseus."

Xanthus, who was carrying the luggage of Bacchus, said: "I can go no farther; being alive, I will not be allowed in the boat. Get some of these dead men, who are going by all the time and are bound to go to hell, to carry your luggage." Four men came along with a dead man on a litter. Bacchus halted them and said: "Say, there, you dead man, I want you to carry some light luggage to hell for me. Will you do it?"

He says "I will charge you 2 drachmas." Bacchus replied, "That is excessive; it is entirely too much. I will give you 9 oboli." The dead man said: "Go on with the litter." He would not consider it. That sort of thing happened twenty-four hundred years ago. So we need not be particularly scared here. [Laughter.]

I recollect another one of those admirable comedies, one in which the poet declaimed very much against the avarice and greed of the Athenians, and declared that it amounted to impiety against the gods. And, contrary to the law, he was allowed to have the play produced twice for its good effect on the people. We are up and down all the time, and I have about concluded that, as bad as we are, we are as good as anybody else. It is not necessary for us to flatter ourselves that we are any better, because, Senators, the time is coming when we shall have to take our descent, too. There is the rise and fall of the Roman Empire, and of all other empires, and, according to Silas Wegg in Boffin's Bower, there is also the "Rising up and falling off of the Rooshian Empire."

Getting back to the little island of Santo Domingo, if we are to take charge of it of course that means indefinite extension. The effect of its propinquity to us, 80 or 90 miles, while it is from a remote island a thousand or two miles distant, does not seem to me to amount to anything, because we can string a cordon of islands that would encircle the globe and carry our flag all over the earth.

The permanent occupation of the island is really meant. The question is, Do you want permanent occupation of any of these islands or republics? There are not many. There are two black republics on one island. When you get on farther there is France, with Martinique and Guadaloupe, with only 1½ per cent of white people. They claimed 3 per cent, according to the census of 1888, but the American consul tells me it is only 1½ per cent. Take the Danish group, 32,000 population, 2,000 white, and singularly enough, the English language. It is black. So with the Virgin Islands—5,000 black, 500 white people. Jamaica has 756,000 negroes, according to the census of 1888, and only 13,000 white people, and more than half of the white people have left since the withdrawal of the troops from the cantonment on the Blue Mountains. Barbados is the most thickly settled part of the earth and has no white population. The same condition prevails there. They have renounced in Jamaica their responsible government, as the English call it—the autonomous government, as we would call it—because of the necessity of the negro voting and the disorder that ensued. Then there are San Lucia and Grenada, of the Windward group, and they are practically all in the same condition.

When we get to the mainland, I wish to ask if there is any Senator here who is willing to take charge of Venezuela? That is a case in point. It has one white person to 21 inhabitants, and it has had eighty-two revolutions in eighty-four years. The present President is part Spanish, part Indian, and part negro. There are not any fairer constitutions and laws on this earth than are found in all the criminal and civil codes of the Spanish-American States. There are no better written ones here. The trouble is that nobody pays any attention to them there. Theirs is a personal government; somebody has said "a personal despotism tempered by assassination."

If we settle the debts of Santo Domingo and take care of their well-being, to use the kindly language of our Executive, to be helpful to them, we will find ourselves with our hands full attending to the business of other people and nothing left for the American people. I do not believe the American people have conferred any power upon the President of the United States to interfere in settling the debts of other people and maintaining order in other countries.

Not only that, but the President is to guarantee to maintain their territorial integrity. That is a pretty strong guaranty. That means that he will call out the whole Navy if necessary. There was a great deal of fear manifested some time ago that an Italian war ship might seize a custom-house in Santo Domingo. They would not have found much in it. I think Colonel Colton is getting about all the money going now. Could we have offered any reason against the Italians seizing a port to enforce a debt? We sat very quiet a good many years ago and saw Great Britain take possession of Vera Cruz. We saw them make a hard bargain with Mexico, and compel Mexico to surrender all the customs receipts at Vera Cruz to pay the interest on the $50,000,000 gold debt; and about all the imports into Mexico were through Vera Cruz. Tampico was not much. Mazatlan, Acapulco, and San Blas had declined since the Philippines had ceased to be an appendage of the viceroyalty of Mexico.

We have submitted—I will not say submitted to it, but I will say that we have permitted it—because we certainly could stop it if we wished to, but we have permitted it from a sense of right, because in the main when we run along and stagger and fall down and get up again the American people do about what is right. They are trying to do what is right. The only question is whether we agree with them or not; whether the opinion of a great many is better than the opinion of any one man.

In a multitude of counsel there is safety. But at any rate it is taken as a presumption granted that every man is to do his duty as laid down for him by the Constitution and laws of this country, and therefore we do not want to impugn the motives of anybody.

We do not want to say—I do not want to say, and I will not say—that the President simply wishes to extend the influence of the United States, to mark and signalize his Administration as a brilliant one in history. I think the President a man full of restless physical energy and industry, and, I will say, intellectually also restless and ambitious and very anxious to do something and to be continually impressing himself upon current events, and he may do that through a very laudable ambition, with no desire to set aside the Constitution. But the question is for us to determine whether he is doing it or not. As I said a while ago, the way to hell is paved with good intentions, and the last man to judge the intention is the man himself. He will see it if he is wrong, giving him credit for the proper motive always.

I will not discuss the treaty here, but, in my opinion, the Senate has lost very directly and substantively a part of its authority when it permits—I will use that word—without a protest the President to carry into effect a treaty which never has been here ratified, and no euphemism in the English language can conceal the fact that that is being done.

Whether it is desirable on the part of the American interests there that it should be done is also a question among them. I have had communications from a man who is the largest American owner in the island, and he thinks the treaty would not be best for reasons which he sets forth at great length. He is an intelligent man. He evidently understands what his own business is. He has the largest estate there, and if you permit him to say so there will not be any treaty. But we can not permit a man who has transferred his property to a foreign country to come in and act as a makeweight in deciding the policy of this country toward another, even if the President should consider it very "helpful."

I do not believe any amount of help will make these people stand on their feet. I do not believe there is a country under heaven that would consent to receive that island, or any part of it, as an appendage, a dependency, or an integral part. If you could suddenly remove the inhabitants, you would have perhaps the most beautiful and the most fertile island in the world, with greater capacity probably than any other, but you can not kill off the people; you can not transport the people. If in a republic there could be such a punishment as banishment inflicted upon people, without giving them a day in court, it would be an act of the highest consideration and the highest importance to the future of this Republic to transport every colored man in the United States to some congenial climate and provide him for a year or two with subsistence; I mean looking in the long run at the future of this great Republic, with its enormous possibilities and capacities. I am looking at it from a cold-blooded standpoint, stripping myself of all sentiment in the matter. There is no sum that can be calculated and no number of ships that can be built for which I would not be willing to vote in order to carry those people where they could be happy and contented and could prosper.

I wish to say further that I would not infringe upon the rights of a single solitary one of them here or elsewhere, in this country or anywhere else. I would not try to suppress and put down a ruler, whether in a republic or a monarchy, because he was black or brown or red or yellow. I would give freedom to every country having the territorial area and a population sufficiently large in number and sufficiently homogeneous. I believe those are the definitions that Mr. Webster laid down in connection with the revolt of the Hungarians. When he sent Mr. Mann to investigate the extent of the Magyar strength, the Austrian minister, Baron Hulsemann, resented the inquiry, which indicated a disposition to acknowledge belligerent rights in the Hungarians. Mr. Webster said, with great emphasis, that whenever any country anywhere has territory sufficient, people enough, and a people sufficiently homogeneous in their interest, the United States will not turn a deaf ear to their appeal for moral support. I feel those words of Daniel Webster tingling in every drop of blood in my veins; and I do not care whether the people are under the control of this country or any other.

I say, moreover, that a man who loves liberty for himself and denies it to other people has not the faintest conception of what the principle of liberty is. He only values it as a personal convenience to himself, and he does not know the great abstract principle that governs human life.

Now, Senators, I have no desire to continue this inconsequential talk that I have made here, I must say without any preparation whatever, but simply have made because of speeches which I heard delivered yesterday. I have heard only two or three, but they seem to be so wide from the mark that I felt called upon to submit some views of my own upon this question, I hope with some effect. I am not one of those people so modest as to believe that they can never give any sort of enlightenment to anybody in the world, because I think it would be very presumptuous for a Senator to rise in his place and occupy the time of the Senate if he did not think that what he said would interest, if it did not instruct very much. I will not call names, but one of my friends entirely deprecated his own ability, and of course it looked very modest of him with a deferential hand to wave aside these compliments. I suppose he has heard somewhere that modesty does much become a woman. At any rate, I am not one of that class. I want to thank the Senate for its attention, and I wish to say when the question comes up in secret session I will speak further.

Right here I wish to make one remark, and I shall be through. The question was asked by my distinguished friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] yesterday, of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I think, whether or not we could not have the discussion of the treaty with open doors; that it was a matter of vast public interest, and that the time for secrecy in the discussion of our foreign affairs had passed away; that the people were losing confidence in the Senate. I am against any open-door consideration of any treaty. It does not make any difference to me about the curiosity of people. They have delegated their authority to the Senate, and they await the issue. They are not in a hurry to know what the Senate is going to do. Therefore I do not subscribe to the habit of allowing myself to be quoted in the newspapers as to how I shall vote on measures. Let time develop it. There is no use of polling votes in advance of the time. If a motion is made to open the doors, I shall vote against it. There may be nothing in this treaty which demands secrecy, but once you establish the open door you will never shut it again. In fact, I think the experience of over one hundred years has about demonstrated the fact that the Senate proceeds, as a general thing, in the best possible way to do its business, and I am for adhering to old customs and all old manners.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it seems to me—and I am impelled to say it by remarks made by the Senator who has just taken his seat [Mr. MONEY] in regard to the question whether this is a consideration of the people of this island or of the territory—it seems to me that this is purely a business proposition which presents itself, and it relates to the territory of the island of Santo Domingo and not the people. Whatever I may say or however I may vote in regard to this matter, at any rate it will be from that standpoint and not from the standpoint of a few thousand or a few hundred thousand people who may happen to occupy this island. If the Senate thirty-five years ago had performed what now appears to have been its plain duty, this question would not be before the Senate. There was an opportunity, when there were about a hundred and sixty thousand people upon this island, to make them a part of the geographical area of the United States.

The reasons given them are as apt to-day as when they were given. The handful of natives who occupy that island would be, if I may use the term, farmed out in one generation, just as we farmed out a corresponding element on the Pacific coast when we took it. They would be lost in the predomination of the white race and white interests. They would be Americanized. I am not in favor of the acquisition of more islands or additional territory for the purpose of maintaining the status of the territory as we find it. I am not in favor of holding the Philippine Islands in order to maintain the Philippine characteristics. I am not in favor of retaining the island of Porto Rico for the purpose of maintaining a civilization upon the status in which we found it. The only justification on earth for the addition of territory to this country is that we may bring it within the influence of our own civilization and that we may transform it from the character in which we found it to the character which we recognize as being the foundation of our own country.

The island of Santo Domingo is without population as I understand it. The whole question that has been under consideration for days would be settled by the annexation of this island to our country by treaty, not for the purpose of gaining agricultural facilities or possibilities, not for the purpose of adding these people to our population, but for the purpose of establishing there in the mouth of the canal a picket post which would give us at least equal advantages with the other nations of the earth should difficulty arise in regard to possession of the canal. Every other island in the Caribbean Sea is owned or controlled by a foreign nation that may in any hour be a hostile nation. This is the only remaining island which is free to deal with itself and its own affairs. It is the last on the counter in the markets of the world, and at this time it is free to make a treaty that shall bring its soil under our dominion, subject to our necessities or our conveniences. But if we are to stand off and draw fine lines as to what we may do or what we should do out of consideration for the people of that island, in an hour when we least expect it we will find complications arising through foreign interference and influence which will make it impossible for us to acquire that soil upon which to make our coaling stations, upon which to establish our picket posts in front of our great possession on which we are about to expend hundreds of millions of dollars. I say we will find it closed to us.

I am free to say that when this matter was up for consideration only a few months ago I had a letter from a prominent man in that island, who told me it was within his knowledge that there was at that time an attempt being made to enter into an arrangement with one of the most powerful governments of Europe with a view to doing just what we did—acting as the financial agent to collect the revenues of the ports of the country and to give them a foothold. Great nations of the earth, when they once have a foothold, keep it. It is true that the instance of our possession of Cuba is cited as an exception, but we kept our influence there, and our influence in Cuba is as potent to-day as though it were a part of the domain of the United States, because we have the right to control the Cubans in their foreign relations. That is what counts among the nations of the earth. It is seldom that interference in the domestic affairs of a dependency amounts to anything. The controlling nation, as a rule, is very glad to have them take these local arrangements off its hands, but what it is persistent in maintaining is the control of that nation in its dealings with other nations.

There is a cordon of islands in the West Indies which, with the exception of Cuba and Santo Domingo, are owned by the great nations of the world. England and France and Denmark and the combination of European nations own a continuous line of islands, through which there are two openings of over 90 miles in width almost within the reach of a cannon shot. Every vessel that sails from an Atlantic port to the Panama Canal passes the islands of Santo Domingo and Cuba. Cuba is friendly to-day under our control; free in time of war to make alliance with foreign nations; and this little island in the market for any nation to buy or control.

The solution of this question, one that would avoid the necessity of considering the question how far we can go in protecting it, is for this body, in its capacity under the constitutional privilege of advising the President, to advise that a treaty of annexation be made. There are less than 1,000,000 on the island. It is capable of sustaining more than 8,000,000 people, according to the recognized basis on which such estimates are made.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have examined this matter, and there are nearer 2,000,000 than 1,000,000. The Senator is clear off on that.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Yearbook gives a population of 510,000 for Santo Domingo, and in my judgment the population of Haiti is just about the same.

Mr. TILLMAN. It has always been recognized by every geography that I have seen that there are twice as many in Haiti as in Santo Domingo.

Mr. HEYBURN. The population is necessarily merely a matter of estimate. I know men who are in the island, and I have attempted to ascertain as nearly as possible what the population of those two republics is, and I feel justified in saying, from such information as I have obtained, that the population has been largely overestimated in the Yearbook, and that there are less than a million people in the two republics, while the island is capable of sustaining a population, upon a liberal basis, of more than 8,000,000 people.

The United States have never undertaken a contract with civilization that we have not made good, and it would be a sorry admission if we could not civilize an island situated as is the island of Santo Domingo. We would civilize it by replacement, by substitution of American institutions and American citizenship for those of the natives. Will any Senator admit that our people are not capable of dominating a handful of natives who have never shown any capacity for self-government, who have had 18 revolutions in twenty-five years; a country where out of 18 presidents 16 were overthrown by revolution; in whose history but five men have ever lived to serve out their terms as president; a nation utterly incapable of protecting itself in the financial dealings of the world, that had to reach out to us or to some other nation for help in order to protect itself against the sheriff's hammer?

So, I say, at this time it seems particularly appropriate that we should take up for consideration the resolution now resting with the Committee on Foreign Relations, which provides that the Senate shall advise the President of the United States to open negotiations for acquiring this island as a part of our own country, and then to deal with it as we would deal with any other frontier—use it for the purpose of protecting this great investment, not only an investment in money, but an investment that shall be so potential in the event of foreign war on the part of this country, that without it it might mean, not defeat, but difficult victory.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator evidently is in earnest, and I would suggest that as we have the President, the only President of Santo Domingo of which we know anything, already in our keeping, it would be a very easy matter to make a negotiation with him, representing the Government of Santo Domingo, for this one or two millions of population, whichever it may be. If the Senator's colleagues on the other side have not enough colored people in the Philippines and in the South and are gluttonous, I think he had better put the matter to a vote and let us see.

Mr. HEYBURN. What I am asking is not for the colored people of Santo Domingo, but I am asking that the white people who may become citizens of Santo Domingo be given the opportunity and protection that would naturally come with the acquisition of that country. I want to substitute the white race there for the natives who are there now. Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. TILLMAN. Not at all, but I should like the Senator to be a little consistent in dealing with the colored people and not be so kind to those near by and so cruel to those abroad.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know to what act or word of mine the Senator refers in drawing that comparison. I will deal with each of those questions, so far as I am concerned, as they arise; but for the present it is sufficient to consider the question as it pertains to the island of Santo Domingo and the inhabitants there. They are a rebellious and incompetent people, and it would be a slander upon the American people to say that an equal number, or a much less proportion, of Americans could not overcome them in their habits of life and the grasp they have upon the affairs of the country, and that it would not be merely a question of a gradual displacement and substitution. It is a fair land. I might speak from a selfish standpoint and talk of its resources, of the possibilities of its commerce and its agriculture, of its mines and its forests. I am speaking solely and simply from the standpoint of national defense, from the necessities of to-day and to-morrow, and I say that this country should possess that territory without regard to whether there is a man, white or black, upon it. That is the position. I say the substitution of that view will eliminate these questions of detail as to whether or not the President had the power, as to whether or not he exceeded his power, as to whether or not he should have done this or should not have done that. All those questions would be settled by a single stroke of the pen that seals the bargain and makes that island a part of the United States geographically.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who is going to sign for the other people, though?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Government of that island. We have a treaty with Hayti. We had until 1898 a treaty with the Republic of Santo Domingo.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are you going to let some little President who happens at the time to be in power sign for them and then go on and seal it?

Mr. HEYBURN. Under the law of nations that binds them just as surely, and if it does not we have a way of making them keep their contract and observe their treaty. There is no difficulty about finding contracting parties. There is one here, and we will find one there. We will determine the question as to the power of the party that assumes to contract for the people of Santo Domingo.

I merely desired, Mr. President, as this question of Santo Domingo was before the Senate, to express these views. I do not desire to discuss the bill that is already in committee and under consideration there, but I felt that it was opportune at this time to make these suggestions.

MISSIONARY BAPTIST CHURCH, OF ROCK SINK, FLA.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1725) granting certain land to the Missionary Baptist Church, of Rock Sink, Fla.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in line 5, before the word "Florida," to insert "Rock Sink;" in the same line, after the word "Florida," to insert "and their successors," and in line 9, after the word "east," to insert "and when no longer used for said purposes the same shall revert to the United States;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey to the trustees of the Rock Sink Missionary Baptist Church, of Rock Sink, Fla., and their successors, in trust, the following-described land for use for school, church, and cemetery purposes: The south half of lot 11, section 13, township 8 south, of range 13 east; and when no longer used for said purposes the same shall revert to the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT ELIZABETH, N. J.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 846) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office at Elizabeth, N. J.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office at Elizabeth, N. J., from $200,000 to $250,000, and allows the Secretary of the Treasury to use the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purchase of a suitable site upon which to erect the building.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill 1345, the consular bill. I should like to have it read and the committee amendments agreed to. It is the unanimous report from the committee. I do not expect to discuss it this afternoon, but I should like to have the bill read and the amendments disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 4, after the word "act," to strike out "and under such rules and regulations not inconsistent herewith as shall be prescribed by the President;" so as to make the section read:

That the consular system of the United States be reorganized in the manner hereinafter provided in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, after line 6, to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That there shall be not more than two consuls-general of the first class, at $12,000 each per annum; not more than seven consuls-general of the second class, at $8,000 each per annum; not more than nine consuls-general of the third class, at $6,000 each per annum; not more than eleven of the fourth class, at $5,500 each per annum; not more than fourteen of the fifth class, at $4,500 each per annum; and not more than seven of the sixth class, at $3,500 each per annum. That there shall be not more than ten consuls of the first class, at $5,000 each per annum; not more than thirteen consuls of the second class, at $4,500 each per annum; not more than twenty-two consuls of the third class, at $4,000 each per annum; not more than thirty-two consuls of the fourth class, at $3,500 each per annum; not more than forty-five consuls of the fifth class, at $3,000 each per annum; not more than fifty-eight consuls of the sixth class, at $2,500 each per annum; and not more than ninety-two consuls of the seventh class, at $2,000 each per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 16, to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 2. That the consuls-general and the consuls of the United States shall hereafter be classified and graded as hereinafter specified, with the salaries of each class herein affixed thereto.

CONSULS-GENERAL.

Class 10, $2,000.—Aguascalientes, Amherstburg, Antigua, Asuncion, Bagdad, Belleville, Belgrade, Bristol, Brockville, Campbellton, Cape Gracias, Cape Haitien, Cartagena, Castellamare di Stabia, Catania, Ceiba, Charlottetown, Chatham, Coaticook, Colonia, Cornwall, Durango, Ensenada, Fort Erie, Funchal, Gaspe, Gibraltar, Glauchau, Goderich, Goree-Dakar, Grenville, Grenoble, Guadeloupe, Guelph, Hermosillo, Hobart, Iquique, Jalapa, Jamestown, Kingston (Ontario), La Paz, Limoges, London (Ontario), Madrid, Manzanillo, Maskat, Matamoros, Messina, Moncton, Niagara Falls, Patras, Peterborough, Port Hope, Port Louis, Port Rowan, Port Stanley, Prescott, Progreso, Puerto Cabello, Puerto Plata, Riga, Rouen, Saigon, St. Christopher, St. Hyacinthe, St. Johns (Quebec), St. Pierre, St. Stephen, St. Thomas (Ontario), Saltillo, Sarnia, Sierra Leone, Sivas, Stanbridge, Stavanger, Stratford (Ontario), Suva, Tahiti, Turin, Turks Island, Tuxpam, Utilla, Venice, Wallaceburg, Warsaw, Windsor (Ontario), Windsor (Nova Scotia), Woodstock.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 6, line 10, after the word "consuls," to strike out "of the sixth and seventh classes, provided for in the third section of this act;" in line 15, after the word "consuls," to strike out "and shall be eligible for promotion equally with other consuls of the sixth and seventh classes;" and in line 18, after the word "heretofore," to strike out "commercial agents shall be brought into the classification of the service under this act, and the grade shall thereafter cease," and insert "the grade of commercial agent is abolished;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the offices of vice-consuls-general, deputy consuls-general, vice-consuls, deputy consuls, and commercial agents shall be filled by appointment, as heretofore, except that whenever, in his judgment, the good of the service requires it, consuls may be designated by the President without thereby changing their classification to act as vice-consuls-general, deputy consuls-general, vice-consuls, and deputy consuls; and when so acting they shall not be deemed to have vacated their offices as consuls. Consular agents may be appointed, when necessary, as heretofore. The grade of commercial agent is abolished.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the list of consuls-general in the bill is taken from the present law?

Mr. LODGE. It is, Mr. President. It is taken exactly from the present law. I will say to the Senator that I had no intention of going further with the bill this afternoon than to have the amendments adopted. Then it will be perfectly easy, if the Senator should desire to make any change in the list, to do so.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I simply inquire for information. I understand the present law places the consulship at Monterey, Mexico, as a consul-generalship of northern Mexico. That has been my understanding of it.

Mr. LODGE. The official report of the State Department describes it as a consulate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It certainly has consular jurisdiction over a great territory there beyond the borders of Monterey.

Mr. LODGE. If it is a consul-generalship and the report of the State Department is incorrect, it is a very easy matter to restore it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I simply wanted to make the inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. I do not propose to go on with the bill this afternoon. I merely wish to get the committee amendments adopted and the bill reprinted so it will be convenient for the Senate in the future. I do not think there will be very much opposition to the bill. It is a unanimous report from the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to section 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 21, to strike out section 4, in the following words:

SEC. 4. That within one year after the date of the passage of this act the President shall classify the consulates-general and the consulates in accordance with the provisions of section 3, and after such classification shall have been made the classification of any consulate-general or consulate may be changed, or a new consulate-general or consulate created and placed in any class, the complement of which is not filled, by Executive order of the President.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 4, to strike out section 5, in the following words:

SEC. 5. That immediately after the classification required by the foregoing section shall have been made the incumbents of the consulates-general, consulates, and commercial agencies who are included in the provisions of this act then holding office shall be assigned by the President to the various classes as nearly as possible in accord with the duties, conditions, and compensation of the offices they held when said classification was made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 20, to strike out section 7, in the following words:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of State, or such officer in the Department of State as the President shall designate, the chief of the Consular Bureau, and the chief examiner of the Civil Service Commission or some person whom said Commission shall designate, shall constitute a board of examiners for admission to the consular service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 2, to strike out section 8, in the following words:

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of said board to formulate rules for and hold examinations of applicants for admission to the consular service; and whenever a vacancy shall occur in the sixth or seventh class of consuls which the President deems it expedient to fill, the Secretary of State shall require the said board to examine such applicants as shall be designated therefor by the President. The board shall as soon thereafter as possible hold such examination and certify to the Secretary of State the names of the applicants who have passed the examination. No one shall be examined who is under 21 or over 40 years of age, or who is not a citizen of the United States. The scope and method of the examination shall be determined by the board, but among the subjects shall be included at least one modern language other than English, and the commercial resources and business of the United States, especially with reference to the possibilities of increasing and extending the trade of the United States with foreign countries. In certifying to the Secretary of State the list of those eligible for appointment, the board of examiners shall accompany the certificate with a detailed report showing the qualifications, as revealed by the examination, of each person so certified.

When it is designed by the President to assign a consul who is to be appointed to a consulate in a country where the United States has extraterritorial jurisdiction, the Secretary of State shall so inform the board of examiners, who shall include in the list of names certified by it in accordance with the following provisions of this section only such persons as have passed the examination provided for in the foregoing paragraphs of this section, and who also have passed an examination in the fundamental principles of the common law, the rules of evidence, and the trial of civil and criminal cases.

The list of names which the board of examiners shall furnish as required by this section shall be sent, with the accompanying reports, to the President for his information.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 13, to strike out section 9, in the following words:

SEC. 9. That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of consul-general, or consul above the sixth class, members of the two classes next below that in which the vacancy occurred shall be deemed eligible to be selected to fill such vacancy.

For the purpose of such promotion consuls and consuls-general shall be classified together according to salary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 20, to strike out section 10, in the following words:

SEC. 10. That the foregoing provisions of this act shall not apply to consular offices which are filled by those who are also accredited as diplomatic agents of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12 (6), page 11, line 3, after the word "which," to strike out "exceeds" and insert "is;" and in line 4, after the word "year," to insert "or more;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. No person who is not an American citizen shall be appointed hereafter in any consulate-general or consulate to any clerical position the salary of which is $1,000 a year or more.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 13 (7), page 11, line 9, before the word "agent," to strike out "commercial" and insert "consular;" so as to read:

SEC. 1699. No consul-general, consul, or consular agent receiving a salary of more than $1,000 a year shall, while he holds his office, be interested in or transact any business as a merchant, factor, broker, or other trader, or as a clerk or other agent for any such person to, from, or within the port, place, or limits of his jurisdiction, directly or indirectly, either in his own name or in the name or through the agency of any other person; nor shall he practice as a lawyer for compensation or be interested in the fees or compensation of any lawyer; and he shall in his official bond stipulate as a condition thereof not to violate this prohibition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 25, before the word "agent," to strike out "commercial" and insert "consular;" so as to read:

SEC. 1700. All consular officers whose respective salaries exceed $1,000 a year shall be subject to the prohibition against transacting business, practicing as a lawyer, or being interested in the fees or compensation of any lawyer contained in the preceding section. And the President may extend the prohibition to any consul-general, consul, or consular agent whose salary does not exceed $1,000 a year or who may be compensated by fees, and to any vice or deputy consular officer or consular agent, and may require such officer to give a bond not to violate the prohibition.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. The sections should be renumbered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is clerical and will be done.

Mr. KEAN. All right.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the bill may be printed as amended by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be reprinted as amended.

Mr. LODGE. The clerks will see that the sections are numbered in accordance with the changes in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The sections will be renumbered.

LIGHT-HOUSE SERVICE.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1358) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of additional light-house districts," approved July 26, 1886.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4670 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4670. The Light-House Board shall arrange the ocean, gulf, lake, and river coasts of the United States into light-house districts not exceeding nineteen in number; that any law or regulation prohibiting the employment in the light-houses of the United States of persons of more than 45 years of age be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WYOMING STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

Mr. KEAN obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to yield to me for a moment to call up a bill.

Mr. KEAN. I was merely going to move an executive session, but I withhold the motion for the present.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 608) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator in charge of this bill whether it does not cover all the public lands in the State and whether it would not repeal the laws which forbid mineral lands from being entered?

Mr. WARREN. It does not cover anything but nonmineral and unappropriated lands, and it does not repeal any other law. It simply provides for the selection of 50,000 acres of unappropriated, unwithdrawn, nonmineral lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming for the present consideration of the bill which has been read?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the question presented by this bill has been the subject of some discussion since this and another bill were reported favorably from the Committee on Public Lands.

The question is quite a serious one. When the respective States were admitted into the Union—the Dakotas, Montana, Washington, and, later, Idaho and Wyoming—grants of public lands were made for specific purposes, and all the grants were about equal in size. In a given State the amount of land appropriated for public purposes happened to be less than in another and adjoining State, but to counterbalance that the amount of land granted for agricultural college purposes or for normal schools happened to be larger in the State having the smaller allowance for public buildings. These grants having been substantially equal in the beginning, and for all public purposes considered as proper objects of national solicitude, may be disturbed by subsequent appropriations for individual States.

Now, it is quite obvious, I think, that if the State of Wyoming were given 50,000 acres of land for a soldiers' home, we should give a like acreage for a similar purpose to all States similarly situated.

This manifest spirit of equity in dealing with the States brings up another question, as to whether it is proper to diminish the public domain, diminish the source from which the great irrigation and reclamation fund is to be constantly replenished, by continuously granting in piecemeal, but still in large quantity, the public domain of the United States.

My impression is that these grants to the States have not been in the main wisely administered. The old swamp-land grant made in 1850 became a public scandal, and it lingers still as a stench in the nostrils of decent administration. The land grants of our Western States have not been selected with that wisdom and regard for the institutions intended to be endowed which should have characterized the matter of selection. I know in the State of Montana the interests of the large cattle-raising people have been particularly consulted. The land grant provided that the lands could not be sold for less than $10 per acre; and yet it is a notorious fact that wheresoever the interests of a large cattle or sheep holding concern became involved lands were selected on mountain tops and hopeless places, where within no range of possibility can the land ever be sold by the State. On the contrary, the land is leased out on a slight rental for long terms, insuring great consolidated land holdings, which are a detriment to the community and in contravention of the general purposes of the Government.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CARTER. I do not know that I have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that this discussion has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARTER. I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota if I have the floor.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Montana. He is now speaking of the State of Montana. I want to call his attention to the fact that the conditions in many other States are entirely different from those he describes as pertaining to Montana.

Mr. CARTER. We do not arrogate to ourselves in the State of Montana excessive virtue, nor do we seek to have it understood that it is impossible for a higher standard of public excellence to exist elsewhere. I am speaking of things of which I know, and I am informed that similar conditions have existed in other public-land States.

I have no objection to granting 50,000 acres of land to the State of Wyoming to maintain a soldiers' home, but we are also called upon to give the State of Idaho 50,000 acres, I believe, or thereabout, for a like purpose. The State of Idaho received a larger grant in aid of public institutions than some States of much greater area. As to whether that grant has been wisely administered or the land wisely selected, I do not know; but I am free to say now that when the Idaho bill comes forward, asking that Congress grant an additional 50,000 acres of land to aid a soldiers' home in Idaho, I shall feel constrained to object, because a bill for granting land in this manner should be a general bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CARTER. In a moment.

As to the policy of such general bills I have very determined views, and I shall oppose such grants all along the line.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that the States do not all have State soldiers' homes.

Mr. CARTER. Montana has one in operation.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say further that as to the equality between the States the State of Wyoming lies a great deal higher in average altitude than the State of Montana, the State of Idaho, and all other States, except Colorado. I say very frankly that no State in this Union has been treated so badly as to the amount and character of public land granted her in the act of admission as was the State of Wyoming, and I wish to say further that Wyoming had no swamp lands and no mismanagement of her State lands.

This bill has passed the Senate, I think, every session for some six or eight years, and so in calling it up I presumed it would excite no debate; otherwise I should not have called it up at this late hour. There is a Home established by the State of Wyoming for old soldiers and sailors. It was thought better rather than to have the United States Government take care of them in National Homes, because the men who went years ago to that country and have lived long in that altitude and atmosphere are happier and their lives are prolonged by sending them to local Homes rather than to distant places.

This land, under the constitution of Wyoming, can not be sold for less than $10 an acre, but it can be leased, and the money goes to this fund, or if any residue, the surplus goes to other charitable institutions.

The bill seems to be well guarded, and I hope the Senate will do as it has done before—allow it to be put upon its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the same question will arise with reference to the Idaho bill, I feel constrained at this time to object, to the end that the entire question involved in additional grants of land may be taken up at the proper time and acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I intended to call up a bill precisely similar to the one which has just been objected to by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], a bill which has been passed through the Senate two or three times; but in view of the statement of the Senator from Montana that he will object, I shall not detain the Senate by asking it to allow me the courtesy of having the bill to which I refer now considered.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DRYDEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. Before this question passes from the consideration of the Senate I wish to call attention to the fact—I would not do so, but for a suggestion made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]—that the Government of the United States now pays $100 per annum for each soldier in the State Homes of every State; and $100 for each soldier aggregates a much larger sum than one-half of the entire cost of maintaining those Homes in the States, as I happen to know.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not maintain that the sum allowed covers all the cost?

Mr. ALLISON. It does not cover all the cost, it is true, but it covers the greater portion of the cost in every State. It covers nearly the cost in my own State. We appropriate annually to these Soldiers' Homes in the respective States $100 for each soldier; and it is a wise thing to do, because it does keep the soldiers in their own States, instead of transporting them to distant parts of the country from their own Homes to the National Homes.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the fact that the Government is now contributing largely more than one-half of the cost of the State Homes, and that is a general provision, and applies to every State Home in the United States.

Mr. WARREN. That is true, except as to it being more than one-half. In a State like Wyoming it does not amount to one-half.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator contend that it costs more than $200 per capita to take care of the soldiers of Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. It does.

Mr. ALLISON. It costs from $130 to $140 per capita in my State.

Mr. WARREN. The cost of living is cheaper in Iowa; but it costs more for each soldier in Wyoming.

Mr. ALLISON. Very likely; but I know there is a provision here—I shall not detain the Senate long—that if the land is not needed for a Soldiers' Home, it shall go to other charitable institutions, which I take it, under the circumstances, will happen if the present relation between the United States and those States should continue.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DRYDEN. I do.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I think it is fair to state that the argument just now advanced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], while new to me, appeals to me very strongly. The moneys now derived from the sales of public lands are put into a reclamation fund, to be used for the reclamation of waste land throughout the United States in the arid region, and in consequence all of the States embraced in the arid and semiarid belt are interested in these public lands, no matter where they may be situated. I think that the subject is serious enough for the Committee on Public Lands to consider it.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JERSEY CITY, N. J.

Mr. DRYDEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2087) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Jersey City, N. J.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, after the word "appropriated," to strike out "nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which shall have sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased or condemned and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury;" and in line 13, after the word "alleys," to strike out "and that no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the said State of New Jersey shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of the said State and the service of civil process therein;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase by private sale, secure by condemnation, or otherwise acquire, a site for and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, with fireproof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices of the United States in the city of Jersey City, in the county of Hudson and State of New Jersey. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved, according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum of $325,000, which is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 20 feet, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. For the convenience of Senators, I desire to make a motion. I understand that quite a number of the important committees of the Senate wish to meet to-morrow and Saturday, and, therefore, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ATLANTA, GA.

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 800) to provide for the erection of a public building at Atlanta, Ga.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate a sum not exceeding $1,000,000 for the erection at Atlanta, Ga., on a site already owned and possessed by the United States, a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, Treasury Department, and other Government offices in the city of Atlanta.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS WITHIN NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY GRANT.

Mr. FULTON. I ask unanimous consent for consideration at this time of the bill (S. 2292) for the relief of certain entrymen and settlers within the limits of the Northern Pacific Railway land grant.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 8, after the word "Company," to insert "and also the provisions of the act of March 2, 1901, entitled 'An act for the relief of settlers under the public-land laws to lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company;'" so as to make the section read:

That the provisions of the act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat., pp. 597 and 620), which provided for the adjustment by the Land Department of conflicting claims to lands within the limits of the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and also the provisions of the act of March 2, 1901, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers under the public-land laws to lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company," be, and they hereby are, extended to include any bona fide settlement or entry made subsequent to January 1, 1898, and prior to May 31, 1905, in accordance with the erroneous decision of the Land Department respecting the withdrawal on general route of the Northern Pacific Railroad between Wallula, Wash., and Portland, Oreg., where the same has not since been abandoned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 8, to strike out section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That this act shall become effective upon an acceptance thereof by the Northern Pacific Railway Company being filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POTOMAC RIVER HIGHWAY BRIDGE.

Mr. FRYE. I reported this morning from the Committee on Commerce Senate joint resolution 23. It is important that it should become a law as soon as possible, from the fact that the time for building the approaches to the Potomac Bridge expires February 18. The joint resolution simply provides for an extension of the time.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 23) providing for an extension of time for completing the highway bridge and approaches across the Potomac River at Washington, D. C.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

An act (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me that I may secure the consideration of a public-building bill?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr LATIMER. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to yield to me for just a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER], and then I will yield to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I do not want to cut off any Senator.

Mr. LATIMER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration——

Mr. WARREN. I believe the Senator from Massachusetts has yielded to me.

Mr. LODGE. I first yield to the Senator from Wyoming, and afterwards I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to Senators that the right to the floor must come from the Chair. The Chair had not recognized the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], but had recognized the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER]. The Senator from South Carolina.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ANDERSON, S. C.

Mr. LATIMER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1447) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Anderson, in the State of South Carolina.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, after line 18, to strike out:

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after said examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Anderson and State of South Carolina, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $75,000.

Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who will then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the result of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals, and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites.

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SHERIDAN, WYO.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 610) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Sheridan, in the State of Wyoming.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, court, and other Government offices in the city of Sheridan, Wyo., the cost not to exceed $160,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be laid aside temporarily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be laid aside temporarily.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to give notice that on Monday, the 29th of January, I shall ask the Senate to fix a time for taking a vote on Senate bill 88, known as the "pure-food bill."

SCHOOL LANDS TAKEN FOR GOVERNMENT RESERVES.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to give notice that on Monday, January 29, after the routine business of the morning hour, I shall ask the Senate to take from the table the bill (S. 1661) to reimburse the States and Territories for sections 16 and 36 when taken for forest or other Government reserves, for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust the Senator from Idaho will endeavor to complete his remarks by 2 o'clock, as the unfinished business will be pressed somewhat at that hour. I hope we may not have to yield to the Senator after 2 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. If it becomes necessary to ask the Senator to yield, I will trust to his generosity and the convenience of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 29, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 25, 1906.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 25, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DEMOCRATIC ABSENTEES.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I wish, by unanimous consent, to make a statement with reference to the pairs and absentees of yesterday. There is nothing in what I may say which reflects upon anybody, but it is an explanation that I think is due absent Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, a report is current to the effect that some Democrats on yesterday were away and refused to vote, and that they did so corruptly is intimated in some instances. I wish to say that there were thirteen absent Democrats. There were two Democrats present who were paired with Members who were absent. One of these was Mr. PATTERSON of South Carolina, who was paired with Mr. CROMER of Indiana. Mr. CROMER is in that State engaged in his canvass and has been since the holidays. Mr. PATTERSON paired with him before the holidays and has been paired with him ever since. The other Member present who was paired was Mr. SULZER of New York, who was paired with Mr. ANDRUS of New York, who was away and is away, as I understand it, because of a death in his family. The Democrats absent were Mr. BELL of Georgia, who was paired with Mr. BURTON of Delaware. This pair was put up some ten days ago. They were both going away, as I understand it, on business of importance to themselves. Mr. BROUSSARD of Louisiana was away. He left last Thursday to go to his home in order to attend to some important business there. Mr. BYRD of Mississippi has been gone for several days and is engaged in the trial of a murder case in which a relative of his is interested. Mr. COCKRAN of New York is in the West and has been in bad health since the holidays and unable to be here. Mr. HEARST is in the West on account of important business interests. He has not been here since the holidays. Mr. HILL of Mississippi was called away last Wednesday, if I remember the date right, on account of important business in his State. Mr. LITTLE of Arkansas is not here and has not been here since the holidays. Mr. LITTLE is engaged in an active canvass for governor of the State of Arkansas. Mr. MCDERMOTT is not here. He has been sick and unable to be here. Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee was not here. He has not been here during the session and, in fact, has not been sworn in. Mr. SOUTHALL of Virginia was not here, but he is sick with pneumonia and unable to be here. Mr. SULLIVAN of New York has not been in attendance since the holidays. He has been in the West, and it was impossible, as I understand it, for him to be present. Mr. VAN DUZER of Nevada is away and has been away on account of sickness in his family. He has not been able to be here since the holidays. Mr. ZENOR of Indiana is not here and has not been for a number of days. Like Mr. CROMER of Indiana, he is engaged in a canvass in his own State.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the special order, the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12707—the statehood bill—and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. CRUMPACKER, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the statehood bill, with Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has forty-four minutes in time remaining, and the gentleman from Tennessee has two hours and six minutes.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the San Francisco Chronicle of January 20, which came to hand this morning, has the following editorial, which I desire to read:

JOINT STATEHOOD—PROPOSED JOINDER OF ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO INEXCUSABLE.

The joinder of Arizona and New Mexico as one State, even with the hearty assent of both Territories, would be unstatesmanlike and grossly improper. To compel it against the wishes of the people of either Territory would be a political crime.

It would be unstatesmanlike and improper for the reason that it would not give adequate relative representation in the Federal Government to a great area of territory with enormous material interests. Population never was and never ought to be the sole consideration in admitting to statehood. Area and industries are also to be considered. The live-stock interests require a comparatively small number of men to operate and direct them, but no one can deny their supreme importance to the people of the whole country, and they are entitled to a just weight in the Government. The same thing may be said with respect to the mining interests. Agriculture and commerce now have an overwhelming preponderance in the national councils, and mining and live stock are entitled to all the additional weight which can be given by two States. But even as to agriculture, and the denser population which agriculture brings, no one can foresee what is in store for Arizona and New Mexico. They both have enormous areas of fertile soil. The limit of their agricultural development will be fixed by the water supply. This has hardly yet begun to be exploited. What the outcome will be it is not yet possible to say, but what may be said with absolute certainty is that the next or the second generation will see in those States an agricultural population which will place either of them far in advance of several States whose title to statehood nobody disputes.

It would be a political crime to join together against the wish of either two populations so diverse as those of Arizona and New Mexico, which are divided from each other by sectional lines. The great majority of the New Mexicans are of the Latin race, or of mixed Latin and Indian. The great majority of those of Arizona are American. The two peoples have different customs, different languages, different civilizations, different ideals. To join them together against their will is to doom them to eternal hatred and strife. The New Mexicans may be willing, because they are in the majority and can impose Latin-American ideals on the American minority; but it would be a crime to permit them to do it, nevertheless.

Mr. Chairman, that editorial represents the unanimous opinion of the people of the State of California, and there is one part of it that has particular application to the question that is now before this House, namely, the question as to what the future of those two Territories will be. American statesmanship has never yet been able to foresee what the future had in store. The expansion of our country has always met with more or less opposition from the centers of population in the East. What has been the history of our acquisitions, and what has been said about them from time to time? Why, sir, when it was proposed to organize the Oregon country as a Territory of this Union there were grave and reverend Senators of the United States who arose at the other end of the Capitol and denounced the proposition in unmeasured terms. I will read for the edification of the House some sentiments which were uttered upon that question. Senator Dickerson, of New Jersey, arose in the Senate, February 26, 1825, and soberly said:

But is this Territory of Oregon ever to become a State, a member of this Union? Never. The Union is already too extensive, and we must make three or four new States from the Territories already formed.

The distance from the mouth of the Columbia to the mouth of the Missouri is 3,555 miles; from Washington to the mouth of the Missouri is 1,160 miles, making the whole distance from Washington to the mouth of the Columbia River 4,703 miles, but say 4,650 miles. The distance, therefore, that a Member of Congress of this State of Oregon would be obliged to travel in coming to the seat of government and returning home would be 9,300 miles. This, at the rate of $8 for every 20 miles, would make his traveling expenses amount to $3,720.

Every Member of Congress ought to see his constituents once a year. This is already very difficult for those in the most remote parts of the Union. At the rate which the Members of Congress travel according to law—that is, 20 miles per day—it would require, to come to the seat of government from Oregon and return, four hundred and sixty-five days; and if he should lie by for Sundays, say, sixty-six, it would require five hundred and thirty-one days. But if he should travel at the rate of 30 miles per day, it would require three hundred and six days. Allow for Sundays, forty-four, it would amount to three hundred and fifty days. This would allow the Member a fortnight to rest himself at Washington before he should commence his journey home. This rate of traveling would be a hard duty, as a greater part of the way is exceedingly bad, and a portion of it over rugged mountains, where Lewis and Clark found several feet of snow in the latter part of June. Yet a young, able-bodied Senator might travel from Oregon to Washington and back once a year; but he could do nothing else. It would be more expeditious, however, to come by water round Cape Horn, or to pass through Bering Strait, round the north coast of this continent to Baffins Bay, thence through Davis Strait to the Atlantic, and so on to Washington. It is true this passage is not yet discovered, except upon our maps, but it will be as soon as Oregon shall be a State.

Mr. Dayton, another distinguished Senator, said:

I trust I may be pardoned here for reading an extract from a western paper of recent date (Louisville Journal), republished in the National Intelligencer, of this city. Here it is:

"What there is in the Territory of Oregon to tempt our national cupidity no one can tell. Of all the countries on the face of the earth it is one of the least favored of Heaven. It is a mere riddling of creation. It is almost as barren as the desert of Africa, and quite as unhealthy as the Campania of Italy. To leave the fertile and salubrious lands on this side of the Rocky Mountains and to go beyond their snowy summits a thousand miles, to be exiled from law and society, and to endeavor to extort food from the unwilling sand heaps which are there called earth, is the maddest enterprise that has ever deluded foolish man. We would not be subjected to the innumerable and indescribable tortures of a journey to Oregon for all the soil its savage hunters ever wandered over. The journey thither, from all accounts, is horrible enough, but it is paradisean when contrasted with the wasting miseries which beset the wretched emigrant when he has reached a point where he fancied his unutterable woes were to cease, but where he finds they are to be increased beyond all endurance. Of the last party of emigrants that left Missouri for Oregon, only eight died of starvation before reaching Fort Hall, which is halfway to the country that is reckoned inhabitable by those who are afflicted with the Oregon mania.

"All the writers and travelers agree in representing Oregon as a vast extent of mountains and valleys of sand, dotted over with green and cultivable spots. This is the representation given by Cox, Bonneville, Farnham, and Hinds. Now, that such a wretched territory should excite the hopes and cupidity of citizens of the United States, inducing them to leave comfortable homes for the heaps of sand, is, indeed, passing strange. Russia has her Siberia and England has her Botany Bay, and if the United States should ever use a country to which to banish its rogues and scoundrels, the utility of such a region as Oregon will be demonstrated."

I read the extract without adopting the sentiments as to the character of the country in the full extent, but this description in a paper of the West so widely circulated as the Louisville Journal is evident to my mind that public sentiment there in behalf of the settlement of Oregon is not so universal as some gentlemen have presented it. I desire here to disclaim any intention to burlesque the subject or feelings of Senators who seem to be extremely sensitive upon the point. With the permission, therefore, of the Senate I will call attention to another extract of a grave tone and from a paper above all exception. I read from the Christian Advocate of the 7th of this month (February):

"The West has land enough yet to settle and improve at home. The population can not be so crowded for half a century to come as to be willing to incur horrors of war to acquire waste lands on the other side of the globe. Indeed, when we take into view the inducements which must be offered to a people circumstanced as the habitants of the Western States and Territories are, in order to induce them to emigrate, and compare them with what Oregon Territory presents, we should be inclined to think the representation of their feelings as having been made on very insufficient grounds. We have some opportunity from our position to form a correct estimate of the soil, climate, productions, and facilities of the country from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean, as we have had a large mission there for several years, distributed in small parties over the Territory, and from all we have learned we should prefer migrating to Botany Bay. With the exceptions of the lands on the Willamette and strips along a few of the smaller water courses, the whole is among the most irreclaimable barren wastes of which we have read, except the Desert of Sahara.

"Nor is this the worst of it. The climate is so unfriendly to human life that the native population has dwindled away under the ravages of its malaria to a degree which defies all history to furnish a parallel in so wide a range of country, and the scattered remnants of the wandering tribes of Indians who still remain exhibit a degree of decrepitude, loathsome disease, and moral degradation which is unknown among any other portion of the aborigines. So entirely sunken and subdued are these wretched people and so rapid has been their decay that they predict their own annihilation from the 'cold sickness,' as they have learned to call the ague, which is a prominent symptom of the terrible malady which annually visits them in all their wanderings."

Mr. Dayton, after arguing that the country was not worth contending for, that it was too remote from the seat of Government, that the distance to the capital around Cape Horn was 18,000 miles and across the continent 5,000 miles, concluded in this fashion:

The power of steam has been suggested. Talk of steam communication—a railroad to the mouth of the Columbia! Why, look at the cost and bankrupt condition of railroads proceeding almost from your capital, traveling your great thoroughfares. A railroad across 2,500 miles of prairie, of desert, and of mountains! The smoke of an engine through those terrible fissures of that great rocky ledge, where the smoke of the volcano has rolled before! Who is to make this vast internal or, rather, external improvement? Whence is to come the power? Who to supply the means? The mines of Mexico and Peru disemboweled would scarcely pay a penny on the pound of the cost. Nothing short of the lamp of Aladdin would suffice for such an expenditure. The extravagance of the suggestion seems to me to outrun everything which we know of modern scheming. The South Sea bubble, the Dutchman's speculation in tulip roots, our own in town lots and multicaulis are all commonplace plodding in comparison.

These are fair samples of some of the views entertained by distinguished statesmen in those days concerning the magnificent empire which has since been divided up into the Commonwealths of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and parts of Montana and Wyoming. In 1838 there were only fifty Americans in that great stretch of country, and where is the American to-day who does not feel proud of the advancement that has been made on that northwest border of our common country?

In speaking of the acquisition of California and New Mexico, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] the other day, the immortal Daniel Webster stated that "they are not worth a dollar, and we pay for them vast sums of money." I have the honor to represent one of the districts of the Golden State. There is not a man, woman, or child within the confines of California that is not proud of her history.

If at the time the great Senator from Massachusetts spoke at the other end of the Capitol, when the question of the acquisition of California was being discussed, anyone had predicted the magnificence, the wealth, the splendor, the greatness of the beautiful metropolis that sits beside the Golden Gate; if anyone had attempted to foretell the surpassing beauty of Los Angeles, of Oakland and Alameda, of San Jose, Sacramento, Stockton, Pasadena, Riverside, and dozens of other splendid municipalities within the confines of the Golden State; if anyone had stated that within fifty years there would be established in California those great universities at Berkeley and at Palo Alto; if anyone had had the temerity to speak of the wonderful development in agriculture, in mining, in shipping, in railroading, in manufactures, and in commerce that would take place within the borders of the new Eldorado, it is not improbable that the "godlike Daniel" would have scornfully pronounced it an iridescent dream or the wild imagination of a diseased brain.

But she has not alone kept pace with her older sisters, she has outstripped many of them in the march of progress. Sir, it will not be long ere the vision of her great poet, Joaquin Miller, will be fully realized:

Dared I to say a prophecy
As sang the learned men of old,
Of rock-built cities yet to be
Along those shining shores of gold,
Crowding athirst into the sea,
What wondrous marvels might be told!
Enough to know that Empire here
Will burn her loftiest, brightest star;
Here art and eloquence shall reign
As o'er the wolf-reared realm of old;
Here learn'd and famous, from afar,
To pay their royal court shall come,
And shall not seek nor see in vain,
But gaze on all, with wonder dumb!

Mr. Chairman, the men who believe that Arizona and New Mexico have no future discount the genius of American citizenship. Why, sir, when Louisiana was annexed it was said that territory was so remote from the seat of Government it would never be possible for us to have easy communication with it. But the genius of Robert Fulton brought forth the first steamship, and it was but a short while before space and distance were being annihilated by the leviathans of the ocean. And so, when New Mexico and California were annexed, again American genius asserted itself, and before long we found railroads, those forerunners of civilization, going out into what was then described upon our maps as the "Great American Desert." And, in 1868, the genius of George Westinghouse brought into existence the air brake, that wonderful invention that made it possible to run the lightning express, and which has brought San Francisco within four days' travel of the Capitol at Washington.

Sir, the possibilities of Arizona and New Mexico are illimitable. It is less than twenty years since it has been safe for settlers to go into Arizona. We all remember how, less than a score of years ago, Geronimo and Natchez with their bands of marauding Apaches shot down the adventurous frontiersman. It was like taking life into one's own hands to go there. It was almost like a deliberate attempt at self-slaughter. Instead of deriding the people of that Territory we should applaud their pluck and courage and enterprise.

The gentlemen who favor this measure have no conception of the possibilities of that country under a system of modern irrigation.

Why, in the southern part of my own State up to five years ago there was a great stretch of barren waste that was marked on the map as the "Colorado Desert." The railroad conductors, as you passed across it, pointed it out to you and told you that at its lowest point it was 300 feet below the level of the sea; that not a human being inhabited it, and that it was shunned even by the wild coyote and the death-dealing rattlesnake. And yet, sir, within five years life-giving water has been brought upon that land, and as though it had been changed by the touch of a magician's wand, the whole character of the landscape has been altered. It is no longer called the "Colorado Desert;" it is now known as the "Imperial Valley," and it affords a habitation, a shelter, and a home to 8,000 happy human beings. Where before the sagebrush and the cactus held undisputed sway, thriving farms and busy towns have sprung up over night seemingly.

Sir, the development of irrigation systems brings manufacturing in its train. Wherever there is an impounding dam, electric power can be generated. It has been so in my own State, for where we have constructed our irrigation works we have also been able to develop electric power. We carry that power for two and three hundred miles. We are building factories and workshops hundreds of miles away from the source of the power. Up to twenty years ago the cotton growers of South Carolina and Georgia were sending their raw product to the factories in New England; but in more recent years they concluded that it would be wiser to bring the factory to the cotton field; and in these recent years the development of the South has been marvelous. So will it be with Arizona. [Applause.]

To-day she is sending all of the wool, which she produces in abundance, to the eastern seaboard. With the development of her electric power the factory will come alongside of the sheep range. It is not improbable that she will turn out great quantities of cloth, and felt, and cashmere, and shawls, and carpets, and everything that is manufactured from wool. It is not an empty boast to say that within a few years her inhabitants will be turning their attention to manufacturing interests, just as they have heretofore turned their attention to mining and agriculture, to sheep herding and cattle raising. The Colorado, the Salt, the Gila, and the Little Colorado rivers will give her sufficient electric power to run millions of spindles. With the opening of the Panama Canal she will be enabled to send her products into the markets of the world and become an effective competitor with her eastern sisters.

In California there lives a man who has wrought wonders in the development of plant life. His name has become a household word. I speak of Luther Burbank, of Santa Rosa, Cal. He has lately produced a spineless cactus. It will not be many years before the arid and semiarid regions of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico will be converted into magnificent pastures. When you consider that in 1870 Arizona had but 172 farms, containing 22,000 acres; that in 1890 she had but 1,400 farms, containing 1,300,000 acres; that in 1900 she had 6,000 farms, containing 2,000,000 acres, and that all of this acreage was cultivated under most adverse conditions, it requires no great stretch of imagination to predict a marvelous future for the agricultural interests of that Territory.

And New Mexico has also been retarded in her growth. She has been cursed with the so-called "Spanish and Mexican land grants." Take the Maxwell grant alone; it contains millions of acres. In extent it equals many of the principalities of Europe. These grants are held by few people. They are not cut up into small holdings. In my own State, before similar grants were cut up and sold in small tracts, there was arrested development, but as soon as the settler was allowed to purchase a few acres of these extensive domains conditions altered. Towns and cities sprung up in the midst of fertile fields. So will it be in New Mexico when the great land grants of that Territory are divided into small farms that will sustain a large population of thriving agriculturists. And, by the bye, there has been much said about population in this debate. Arizona to-day has a population of nearly 200,000. Within the past five years there has been a wonderful development within her confines. I visited Yuma last summer and saw the evidences of progress and prosperity on every hand.

Why, sir, of the thirty-two States that have been admitted into the Union since the formation of our Government, twenty-four had a smaller population than Arizona now has when they were admitted, and twenty-seven out of the thirty-two had a smaller amount of taxable property.

I maintain, too, that the people of the United States made an implied promise to the pioneers who braved all the hardships of the frontier to build a State out of the desert and wilderness. The act of Congress which created the Territory of Arizona and fixed its boundaries contained the following language:

Provided, That nothing contained in the provisions of this act shall be construed to prohibit the Congress of the United States from dividing said Territory nor changing its boundaries in such manner and at such time as it may deem proper: Provided further, That said government shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in said Territory shall, with the consent of Congress, form a State government republican in form as prescribed in the Constitution of the United States, and apply for and obtain admission into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the original States.

It is the only Territory that has ever been organized to which such a provision was attached. It was detached from the Territory of New Mexico by act of Congress approved February 24, 1863, and when Congress declared—

Provided further, That said government shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in said Territory shall, with the consent of Congress, form a State government republican in form, as prescribed in the Constitution of the United States, and apply for and obtain admission into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the original States—

To my mind it held out the promise of future statehood to those who should be brave enough to go out into the new Territory and build a home at that outpost of our civilization.

I do not say at this time we should give these Territories statehood. If they have not the requisite population, if they have not the requirements that Congress demands for statehood at this time, let them wait; but I maintain it would be a crime to join them at this time into one State, and thus forever prevent the possibility of the construction of two Sates out of that vast domain of 235,000 square miles.

Sir, that area is as large as the States of California and Missouri combined; that area is as large as all of the New England and Middle States, with Maryland thrown in. To go from Yuma to the proposed capital of the new State is a distance of 880 miles. It is wrong, it is unjust, it is outrageous to compel the people of any State to travel so far to their capital. You can travel from Washington to St. Louis, from New York to St. Paul, in a shorter time than you can travel between Yuma and Santa Fe.

The people of the Territory of Arizona ask to be allowed to continue as a Territory. Many of the inhabitants of New Mexico would rather continue to live within her borders as a Territory indefinitely than be joined with Arizona.

I believe that each Territory should be allowed to vote separately upon the question of jointure. I believe they are entitled to such a vote in the name of justice, right, and decency. Section 3 of Article IV of the Federal Constitution reads:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

From a reading of that section it is evident that no two States could be joined except upon the separate action of the legislatures of said States, and by a parity of reasoning no two Territories ought to be joined into a single State except upon the express vote of the people of the two Territories, taken separately.

The emblem of our country bears upon its field forty-five stars. Not one of them has been placed there by coercion. The people of the different States have all come into the Union voluntarily, and many of them were kept knocking at the doors of Congress year after year before they were finally admitted. When admission came it was upon the prayer of a united people. Do not cast a cloud upon that splendid galaxy by forcing the people of Arizona into a union which is distasteful to them and which can bring forth no good results if consummated.

But, sir, it is unfortunate that the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territory should have been coupled with Arizona and New Mexico in one bill. It is generally understood and universally believed that the people of the former Territories want joint statehood, and if my vote and the votes of my colleagues from California could give it to them, they would have it without delay. But a majority of this House has decreed otherwise. We had hoped that the Members of this body would vote down the rule which was adopted yesterday.

Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that we are rapidly approaching the condition which the brilliant satirist, W. S. Gilbert, referred to when he said of the English House of Commons:

When in the House M. P.'s divide,
If they've a brain and cerebellum, too,
They have to leave that brain outside,
And vote just as their leaders tell 'em to.

Sir, the eight Members from the State of California upon this floor would vote unanimously for the admission of the State of Oklahoma, but we would be false to our constituencies, false to our State, false to our trust, and false to our principles if we were to vote for the jointure of Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the rule which was adopted and under which this bill is being considered precludes the possibility of amendment. Therefore nothing remains for us when the time comes to vote but to vote for or against the measure as a whole. The bill contains two separate, distinct propositions. It provides for the admission into the Union of the Territories of Oklahoma and Indian Territory as a single State, which we all favor and favorable action on which should have been taken by Congress at least two years ago; and the other proposition is the jointure of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona against the unanimous, earnest, vehement protest of the people of Arizona, and, I beileve, contrary to the wish of the people of New Mexico, who have been brought to a half-hearted support of this measure only because they believe that in this way alone can they secure admission to the Union at this time. While I favor that portion of the bill that relates to Oklahoma, I am so unalterably opposed to that portion providing for the jointure of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico that I shall vote against the bill as a whole.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] said yesterday in the course of his remarks: "When these Territories are filled up with a sufficient population to be admitted as independent States in this Union, the Congress that then exists will deal justly and fairly, I have no doubt, with the question." Certainly the gentleman did not mean to hold out the hope that there could ever be a division of the proposed State of Arizona if this bill providing for the jointure of the two Territories shall become a law. We all know that the action taken by this Congress, if the bill shall pass, will settle the question for all time. That only through war or revolution will there be a division of one or a jointure of two American States.

The same gentleman, in the course of his remarks, complained because there are fourteen States in the Union that have twenty-eight Senators and only twenty-eight Representatives; because there are six with twelve Senators and only six Representatives, and he clearly indicated the motives that controlled him in his vote by his appeal in behalf of the people east of the west line of Kansas as against the people west of that line. The gentleman is frank enough to admit that he is endeavoring to curtail western representation in the United States Senate. If he had the power to do it, I assume from the line of his argument that neither Arizona nor New Mexico nor the two Territories joined would be admitted to the Union.

The gentleman complains of this so-called inequality of representation in the Senate of the United States, as though it were not a fundamental feature of our political system, established and provided for by the fathers, and continued in all the legislation touching the admission of States since the foundation of the Government.

The very worst that could occur to Oklahoma is a delay of a few months, possibly a year, in the date of its admission to the Union, while if we force this unwilling wedlock of Arizona and New Mexico, without benefit of clergy, with no recourse to divorce courts, we shall have committed a wrong that can never be rectified.

Mr. DALZELL. May I ask my friend a question? Does the gentleman not know that the admission of these new States was never contemplated nor foreseen by the men who made the Constitution? The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has just read, not ten minutes ago, speeches made not more than twenty or thirty years ago in the United States Senate, predicting that the western country never would become part of the United States. Surely the gentleman does not mean to contend that the men who made the Constitution contemplated that we were going to have such a Senate as we have now, as compared with the House of Representatives?

Mr. MONDELL. I think they did, Mr. Chairman. There was almost as great a difference in the population of the States admitted into the Union as there is between some of the newer and some of the older States to-day, and the men who framed the Constitution of the United States, by the ordinance of 1787, provided for the admission into the Union of States when they should have a population one-fifth the average population of the States at that time and a population of about one-tenth of several of the States at that time. This must of necessity be. In the first instance it was necessary in order to form this "more perfect union," and in a country growing and developing as ours is, where the star of empire and the center of population is ever moving westward, there must of necessity be an inequality of representation in the Senate on the basis of population, unless the Western Territories of the Union were kept waiting for a century to have an opportunity to develop to the full stature of the largest States, and unless later, when the West is fully developed, the smaller Eastern States were consolidated, which, of course, could never occur.

But as the gentleman has complained here of this fundamental principle of our Government, I suppose gentlemen in coming days will do the same. In that future day when the historian, sitting in the shade of the orange groves and the oleander hedges of the Salt River Valley of Arizona, amid all the splendid evidences of the tremendous population, wonderful development, and magnificent civilization that shall flourish there, shall write the history of the worked-out coal measures, the exhausted oil fields, the chilled and silent furnaces, and dismantled mills of the now great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania—the story of the passing of that store of fuel upon which her present imperial greatness rests—possibly in that day some Representative of that glorious Southwest will arise here and, equally forgetful as other gentlemen have been of this great principle of our Government, will complain because his magnificent, populous, mighty Commonwealth has no more representation in the Senate of the United States than declining and waning States east of the Allegheny Mountains. I hope not, but I imagine that may occur.

In the day that is sure to come when the magnificent Commonwealth I have the honor to represent on this floor shall have fully developed her 30,000 square miles of coal lands and shall have an output of hundreds of millions of tons of fuel per year, when the mighty steam shovels shall ceaselessly feed her inexhaustible mountains of iron ore into the devouring maws of countless furnaces and mills, when her limitless fields of oil and gas shall light the midnight heavens with the glory of her numberless factory fires, when her fertile valleys and uplands shall all bear golden and abundant harvests, and her splendid citizenship shall have multiplied a hundredfold, possibly some Representative of that mighty Commonwealth may stand on this floor and carp and cavil because the fathers ordained that a State, without regard to its infancy or its decadence, should have equal representation on the floor of the United States Senate. I hope that will never occur. I trust that in that coming day no Representative of the glorious golden West, of the heroic, chivalric West, will ever be so ungenerous as to twit gentlemen from other States upon the fact that his magnificent Commonwealth has so outstripped them in the race of development, progress, and prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the unwilling jointure of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico in a single State would be as unfortunate for the balance of the Union as it would be unfair to the people of those Territories, that as great as the outrage would be upon the people of Arizona to compel them against their will to enter the Union as the hopeless minority of the proposed Commonwealth, in the long run the Union as a whole would be the greater loser from this enforced alliance.

Let us reflect for a moment what the proposed action involves. First, the jointure of two Territories against the vehement protest of practically all of the people of one and with only the tardy, luke-warm acquiescence of the inhabitants of the other in the belief that only by agreeing to this distasteful alliance, which places them in the attitude of aiding and abetting in the outrage of a sister Territory, can they hope to obtain statehood. Second, the absolute disregard of the rights and the wishes of at least 150,000 citizens of the United States, if we count only the people of Arizona and do not take into consideration the large number in New Mexico, to whom this jointure is repugnant. Third, the creation of a State of such tremendous dimensions that, owing to its peculiar mountainous topography, the administration of its internal affairs could only be accomplished at enormous cost in revenue and never-ending vexation, expense, and loss of time to its citizens. The proposed State would contain 236,283 square miles—six times the area of Ohio—which, together with the State of Texas, containing 262,506 square miles, and California, with 156,203 square miles, constitutes an area of 654,992 squares miles, or over one-fifth of our continental territory, largely of rich and fertile lands in three States. Were all of our States of the same average area we should have less than twelve instead of forty-five States.

The argument is made in support of this enforced jointure that the two Territories separately are not prepared for statehood; that they have neither the population nor the resources necessary to support a proper State government, nor to constitute States which in population, wealth, intelligence, and resources are entitled to be placed upon a par with the other Commonwealths of the Union.

I do not pretend to say, in view of the critical attitude which so many of our leading statesmen have assumed in these latter days toward Territories seeking statehood, and of the great growth in wealth and population of the balance of the country, that there may not be some question as to the wisdom, propriety, and justice of bringing either or both of these Territories separately into the Union at this time. My contention is that the people of these Territories should have a fair opportunity and a reasonable length of time in which to demonstrate the value and permanence of their mineral resources, their possibility of development along agricultural lines, with a view of determining whether or no each of them separately is capable of permanently supporting, according to American standards of living, a population sufficient in numbers to warrant their being brought into the Union with all the rights and privileges of sovereign States.

I know there are some who, departing from the time-honored policy of the Republic and of our party, would, if they had the power, insist that all new Territories should have a development as complete as that of great States before admission into the Union, and who, I fear, if they had their way about it, would thrust from the Union some States already admitted. I can not hope to appeal successfully to the judgment of those who hold such views, but I do appeal to those who hold the old-fashioned ideas that every Territory of the Union which has a sufficient population of the proper character to support and maintain according to American standards a State government, and having resources which may be reasonably expected to support a large and prosperous population permanently, shall be eventually admitted into the Union.

Mr. Chairman, at one time and another, here and elsewhere, some of those who have discussed this question have been taken to task because they presumed to suggest that every part or portion of our country is entitled to just and equitable treatment as compared with other portions, and some gentlemen have assumed to refer to this as "sectionalism." Mr. Chairman, I am not disturbed by such suggestions. I have long since discovered that it is a habit with some people to charge others with errors and faults of which they are themselves the most conspicuous victims. To say that the people of the Southwest are entitled to fair and reasonable treatment, compared with other portions of the country, in connection with the consideration of the question of the admission of their Territory into the Union, is not to discuss the issue from a sectional standpoint in any offensive sense, but from the standpoint of truth and justice.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that it is not only of the utmost importance to the people inhabiting any portion of the United States that they shall have the opportunity to come into the Union under such conditions as regards extent of territory and character of political organization as will enable them to establish, develop, and maintain a Commonwealth that can be administered economically, that is homogeneous and harmonious, providing, of course, that there is a reasonable probability of such a State fairly well measuring up, by all proper standards, with the average of their sister States, but it is also important to other portions of the Union that this should be done, in order that there may be that fair balance of power, influence, and responsibility which was the intention of the founders of the Republic and upon which its greatness and stability rests.

I have no quarrel, Mr. Chairman, with the facts of history touching the inequality of area, population, and wealth so marked among the thirteen original States of the Union and by comparison with most of the States of the Union which have been added since. Each has performed, in its own way and along its own lines of development, useful, helpful, and honorable service to the nation. The absence of any one of them or the consolidation of any two of them would have been an inestimable loss to the nation, and each and every one has added its important quota to the sum total of that development along industrial, economic, educational, social, and governmental lines which, in its entirety, measures the glory and the progress of the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, the question of equal representation in the Senate of the United States is but a minor and relatively unimportant factor in the sum total of the power and influence of a Commonwealth in the Republic. Maine, New Hampshire,

Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut as one Commonwealth might have had, had it been so ordained, the same numerical strength in the Senate that the six Commonwealths have to-day; and yet does anyone imagine that thus joined they would have exerted anything like the splendid and helpful influence upon the life and history of the Republic that they have exerted as six separate Commonwealths?

This is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, but it is not a mobocracy; the people exert their influence locally and nationally along well-defined lines. Under our form of government the united voice of the people constitutes public sentiment, and public sentiment is exerted largely by and through Commonwealths. It is so in this body. To the strength of a Congressional delegation is added the force and power and effectiveness which results from the action on many contested points of a State delegation as a unit. In national conventions party platforms more nearly register the united judgment of the States than the opinion of the majority of the lump sum and total of the delegates. In every healthful, useful movement—political, economic, educational—the voice of the American people in assembly and convention expresses itself infinitely more through the solidarity of State units than by mere numerical majority.

The field of our activities in this body is narrow and restricted. The activities of the Commonwealth cover an infinitely wider field and to a vastly greater extent affect the daily life and the personal interests of the individual. Every American Commonwealth is independent of every other, working out the numberless and multiplying problems which confront a free people in the onward march of civilization. You may not applaud the methods of Maine and Kansas in their efforts to put an end to the evils of intemperance by prohibition; you may doubt the wisdom of South Carolina in its legislative efforts to minimize those evils by a State dispensary; you may not in all respects hold wise the legislation of Texas in her efforts to curb the power of great corporations; you may even lag behind the onward march of Massachusetts in her legislation to better conditions surrounding those who labor, and to protect the children of the Commonwealth; you may differ from the citizens of my State in their views and practice as to woman suffrage; perhaps you do not believe in the Iowa idea; and yet we must all admit that these activities mark the earnestness with which the American Commonwealths, along the lines which seem best to the majority of their people, are trying to work out the great problems of the ages, and no student of American history but must confess the obligation which the nation owes to each and every one for its contribution to the sum total of our moral, intellectual, and material betterment.

But for the clarion call of California, which for a long time fell upon the unheeding ears of the country, we would not have awakened to the infinitely deplorable problems that would surround the assimilation of a vast horde of Asiatics into our body politic. More than once Massachusetts has sounded the call to a great national duty; from Mississippi has come—sometimes many of us have thought with unnecessary insistence and persistence—the challenge to stand guard against the tendencies toward centralization, which, in their essential features, are no more approved in Maine than in Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, rather than fewer we need more American Commonwealths, providing that they fairly well measure up to the proper and reasonable dignity of an American State.

Now, it happened that by the fortunes of war, through the sacrifice of patriots and as an inevitable outcome of valorous and heroic deeds, there came into the Union as one State, with the privilege of later dividing, the Republic of Texas, with her 262,000 square miles of territory, a little less in area than that of all of the thirteen original States. There she stands to-day, proud of her magnitude as she is of her history, indivisible, as one of her eloquent sons has said, not that division might not be in the interest of economy of administration and lead to a possible increase of influence, but because it is impossible to divide and separate her priceless legacy of the heroic sacrifice and devotion of her founders.

The irresistible magnet of gold drew to the Pacific coast of our newly acquired Mexican possessions the bold, daring, and adventurous pioneer. The fabulous wealth lying ready for the harvest in many a lode and placer attracted a great population, whom the exigencies of the situation led to seek admission to the Union before the possible development of the region and the coming great increase of population had been dreamed of or suspected, and, under these conditions, added a new star to the banner of the Republic, whose rays illuminated a territory of 156,000 square miles, or over three times the extent of any other State in the Union at that time. Thus, not in the ordinary course of events, but by the fortunes of war and the exigencies of political, not party, conditions, there came into the Union down on the Rio Grande and on the southern reaches of the Pacific two States, comprising more than one-eighth of the entire territory of the Union.

I shall not argue how nearly the advantages and disadvantages surrounding the situation of these two States in the Union compare relatively, but they came into the Union as complete and distinct political entities. Each had its individual history and traditions. There was neither consolidation nor division of political units in their admission to the Union. They remained as they had been, bearing the same names they had always borne, without the sharing or surrender of any of their history or traditions, without division or loss of any of their accomplishments or aspirations as a people.

Now, the admission and the presence of these two great States, one on the coast and the other on the Gulf, in the Southwest, is held by the proponents of this bill as an argument why the two Territories now under discussion should be joined. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, instead of this condition of affairs being an argument for, it is rather an argument against the proposed action, for the conditions were entirely dissimilar. California, whatever may be the expense and difficulties of administering State affairs in so large a territory, is homogeneous, a common ocean fronts the entire length of her territory, practically the same general conditions exist in all portions of the State. Texas, without mountains, compact, with the differing conditions in the distantly separated portions of the State blending almost imperceptibly one into the other, can form no criterion for the action that is now proposed.

But, Mr. Chairman, the presence in that great Southwest country of two great States which are vast, not only in territory, but so rich in resources that they will ultimately contain greater populations than almost any of their sister States, is an argument for the exercise of care, not only in the interest of the Southwest, but of all the country as well, that the people of the remaining territory in that region be not forced into unwilling jointure in another vast, and in this case, unwieldy and inharmonious, State, but rather that time and opportunity be given them to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the most critical, carping, and exacting that they have sufficient resources, when developed, to support two prosperous and populous Commonwealths, measuring well up to the best American standards, and in all essential elements equal to the average of their sister States.

Mr. Chairman, in the limited time at my disposal it would be impossible for me to discuss, except with the utmost brevity, the present condition and the future possibilities of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, with a view of setting forth the facts upon which to found an opinion as to whether these Territories, either now or at some future time, are or shall be, by virtue of their population, wealth, and resources, entitled to admission into the Union as two States, but I propose to treat of these subjects briefly. No one will suggest that either of the Territories has not sufficient area to make a State of imperial size. The area of New Mexico, compact in form, and measuring 122,545 square miles, is three times that of Ohio and nearly thirteen times that of Massachusetts. Her population, at the time of the census of 1900, was 195,310, an increase in ten years of 42,000. From the best available sources of information, it is safe to say that her population at this time is more than 250,000, a greater population than most of the States have had when admitted into the Union.

I shall not go into the question of the character of this population, because I take it for granted, that the Committee on Territories having concluded, after careful consideration, that the population is of a character entitling them to joint statehood, it will scarcely be urged that it is such as would debar New Mexico from admission into the Union as a single State, providing other conditions are satisfactory. As a matter of fact, while there are a considerable number of people in New Mexico who speak the Spanish language, it is also true that there are comparatively few who do not also speak English, and the percentage of Spanish-speaking population is constantly decreasing, and it is conceded that they are a God-fearing, law-abiding people.

In considering the claims of the friends of jointure that Arizona and New Mexico have not proven the existence within their borders of sufficient resources to permanently support large populations, it should be remembered that both of these Territories are on the extreme frontier, and in the case of New Mexico, until within a very few years, a large portion of her territory was claimed as grants from Spain and Mexico, and by reason of these claims, which have only been adjusted within the last ten years, both mining and agricultural development has been largely delayed and retarded.

New Mexico has within her borders, according to a report issued by the Geological Survey in 1902, no less than eleven known coal areas, which in the present state of very limited development, in the report of the same bureau for 1904, are said to contain 1,849,600 acres. This area is estimated to contain 8,813,840,000 tons of coal valued, at an exceedingly low estimate, at $10,000,000,000. Anyone acquainted with the history of coal development knows that, in all probability, the area which will finally be developed will vastly exceed that which has been uncovered and mapped out in the course of the very limited prospecting and development already carried on.

These coals are among the very best bituminous coals in the country. Taken as a whole, they average higher in quality than any coals west of the Allegheny Mountains. In common with Colorado, New Mexico shares in the distinction of being one of the two regions west of the Alleghenies which contain and produce true anthracite. Her vast area of coal lands already prospected would give New Mexico an annual coal tonnage equal to the present bituminous output of Pennsylvania for nearly one hundred years. The value of this wonderful deposit of fuel is greatly enhanced by the fact that there is a vast territory to the south, southeast, and southwest which contains practically no fuel, and which must depend upon New Mexico for fuel for its homes, mines, mills, and manufactories, assuring a mighty industry in coal and coke.

The Territory also contains deposits of iron ore which, as the demand increases, will probably be found to be very considerable in extent, and with a certainty that there will ultimately be built up there numerous manufacturing industries in iron and steel which will make New Mexico a second Pennsylvania.

The Territory also contains enormous deposits of other valuable minerals. In 1903 over 7,000,000 pounds of copper were produced, as well as gold and silver, graphite, gypsum, mica, turquoise, zinc, and other minerals in considerable quantities. But great as are the mineral resources of the Territory, magnificent as her development in mineral production is certain to be, she has infinitely greater wealth in her wonderful soil, and I shall refer to this a little later.

Rich as is New Mexico in mineral, Arizona has greatly exceeded her in actual production, and to-day has a mineral output far in excess of that of any Territory at the time of its admission into the Union. Arizona's copper product for the year 1904 is given by the Geological Survey as 191,602,958 pounds, and as estimated for the calendar year 1905 by the Iron Age it amounts to 255,000,000 pounds, of an approximated value of $30,000,000, while her gold and silver output amounts to about $5,000,000 per annum, or $35,000,000 per annum from the production of these three minerals alone.

The Territory contains deposits of and produces, in addition to the minerals above referred to, asbestos, fluorspar, gypsum, malachite, marble, and many other valuable minerals. The mineral wealth of the Territory alone is sufficient to maintain, for an indefinite time to come, a large and prosperous population. But as Territories should not be admitted into the Union on the basis of their area in square miles, neither should we admit them with the expectation that their mineral wealth alone will, in connection with the manufactories that they produce and develop, support large populations permanently. After all is said and done, the surest and best foundation for a commonwealth is found in a fertile and productive soil, and fortunately, contrary to the generally accepted and popular view among those who have not thoroughly investigated the subject, both Arizona and New Mexico are rich in fertile soils, and not lacking, to the extent that has been popularly supposed, in the life-giving waters which make these soils productive.

It is true that these Territories contain vast areas of lands that can never be utilized except for pasture, that they have some areas that are desert and practically valueless; but we should remember that two-thirds of the Territory of New Mexico might be utterly obliterated from the face of the map and still leave an area as large as the great State of Ohio, that two-thirds of Arizona might be absolutely valueless and there still remain an area as large as Indiana.

While a considerable portion of both Territories is most valuable for grazing purposes, the area of valuable agricultural land is by no means as limited as has been generally supposed. According to estimates of the Reclamation Service, Arizona contains about 1,000,000 and New Mexico about 800,000 acres of lands that may be irrigated in their larger river valleys—in Arizona along the Gila, Salt, Colorado and its tributaries, and in New Mexico along the Rio Grande and its tributaries, the Canadian, the Pecos, and other streams. Let it be remembered that this is simply an estimate of possible irrigation in large areas along the principal streams, and does not take into consideration the practically limitless opportunities for irrigation by pumping, storage, and flood irrigation all over the two Territories. It should not be forgotten that these two Territories—the portions where the greatest opportunities for irrigation occur—have a tropical and semitropical climate; that the soil is marvelously rich; that there are no lands on earth, not excepting the Valleys of the Nile or the Ganges, more fertile than the Valleys of the Gila, the Salt, the Colorado, the Rio Grande, and the Pecos, or that the lands which may be irrigated along those streams produce practically all the products of the Tropics, and that the production per acre is from two and three to twenty times the value of the production per acre of the rich lands of the upper Mississippi Valley.

The Salt River Valley in Arizona produces practically every useful agricultural crop from the cereals of the North Temperate Zone to the date palm of Arabia, and these irrigated lands will support as great a population per acre, and under the improved and intense methods of agriculture practiced, will very probably sustain a greater population than any irrigated area on earth. Egypt, on 5,000,000 acres of irrigated land less than the irrigable area of Arizona and New Mexico, with no forests, no mineral, and few manufactures, supports a population of 11,000,000 souls, pays three millions tribute annually to the Sultan, supports an army of 30,000 men, and one of the most expensive governments on earth, with a staggering bonded debt on which interest must be paid.

But this reclamation of the large river valleys will but mark the beginning of development, for the ultimate irrigated area of both Territories will unquestionably be several times that of their great irrigable valleys. British India has 13,000,000 acres of land irrigated by pumps. In the Madras Province there are upward of 40,000 tanks or reservoirs for the storage of water for use in irrigation. With the marvelous climate and the wonderful soil of these two Territories, surely American energy, genius, and enterprise will not lag behind the populations of India in the development of their irrigation possibilities. To those who suggest that this is chimerical, fanciful, improbable, I would say read the history of every irrigated country on earth; learn what has been done as proof of what will be done in these splendid Territories with ther rich soil and their marvelous climate, which brings to maturity the orange, the fig, and the pomegranate.

But the agricultural possibilities of these two Territories are by no means limited by the area of their irrigable lands. We are fast learning that all lands are not arid or even semiarid within the so-called "arid region." There is in every arid State and Territory of the West considerable areas of land which have hitherto been considered valuable only for pasturage and utilized for that purpose, that with the growth of population and the demand for agricultural products, will be utilized and cultivated for the growth of cereals, forage plants, and vegetables. No one feature of western development in the past few years is more striking and carries greater promise for the future than the increase of lands adapted to so-called "dry farming." Let those who are skeptical on this subject visit the wheat fields of eastern Washington and Oregon, or the dry farming lands of my State. Lands that a few years ago were considered suitable only for grazing and of no great value for that purpose, now produce millions of bushels of wheat and other cereals; vast areas which but a decade ago supported only a few scattered flocks and herds are now under cultivation and supporting large populations.

Fortunately for Arizona and New Mexico, they both contain large areas of land adapted to this class of agriculture. While the southern portion of both Territories is low in altitude, has but limited rainfall, and is arid or desert in character, the northern portions of both Territories are elevated and have an annual precipitation that places them within the semiarid rather than the arid belt. It has been demonstrated in many portions of the intermountain west, from Canada to Mexico, that loam soils having an annual precipitation of from 12 to 20 inches, fairly well distributed, produce, particularly where the land lies fallow every alternate year, forage plants, grains, and vegetables in sufficient quantity and certainty to make their cultivation profitable. Both New Mexico and Arizona have very considerable areas with a rainfall of from 13 to 20 inches and altitudes from five to seven thousand feet and a rich loam soil—ideal conditions for so-called "dry farming"—and in many places in the regions referred to farming without irrigation is now carried on to a limited extent profitably and satisfactorily.

I know that it will be said that these suggestions are largely in the nature of prophecy and that the development to which I have referred is too remote to warrant considering it as a basis of the population requisite for the establishment and maintenance of an American State, but I deny that this development is but a possibility. It is assured by what has already been done in other portions of the West and by reason of which the ultimate vast agricultural development of these two Territories is assured. In any event, in view of the development elsewhere under like conditions, the least we can in justice do is to give these Territories an opportunity to develop their resources, to show what can be done within their borders, and not force them into an unwilling union when there is every reason to believe they will, within a very short time, have demonstrated their ability to maintain large and prosperous populations.

It will and has been urged that these Territories have had the opportunities of development in the long years of their settlement. The fact has been referred to and reiterated that they were the first regions of the present territory of the United States to be settled by white men, and that therefore they should have a much greater development at this time than we find there. Assuredly such an argument can have but little weight with any reasonable student of history. So far as opportunities for any considerable development were concerned, Arizona and New Mexico might as well have been undiscovered countries during the period they were under the dominion of Spain and Mexico. They were outlying provinces far from any considerable population, without means of transportation. Even the marvelous copper deposits of Arizona were valueless until reached by railways from the States. The vast coal deposits of New Mexico are even now almost untouched. Such deposits can be utilized to no considerable extent except with the advance of population, settlement, building up of manufacturing industries, and the establishment of those conditions could only come from the settlement of large populations in adjacent regions.

To-day Arizona and New Mexico are the extreme frontier of the Republic. There has been only a limited development of the farming possibilities of the two Territories, because the sparse population, depending upon mining and cattle grazing, the first industries of a new country, has had little incentive to agricultural development; settlers have not been attracted there while there remained nearer to the older States of the Union the illimitable, fertile plains of the Mississippi Valley. Those lands having been largely settled and developed, the tide of immigration, the flood of homeseekers, must in the very near future spread over these Territories and develop their agricultural, as well as their mineral, resources. The growth and development of an irrigated agricultural region is always necessarily slow, tedious, and laborious; but once the costly works necessary to bring the water within reach of the arid soil have been constructed the tendency is to a constant subdivision of the lands into small areas and the growth of only the more valuable crops, producing larger returns per acre and supporting dense populations.

That Arizona is not the hopeless and arid wilderness that it has been pictured to be by the gentlemen who are insisting upon the jointure of these two Territories is eloquently proclaimed by the fact that she has vast areas of timber lands practically untouched. Arizona and New Mexico together have, according to Governor Brodie, "the largest single belt of pine timber in the United States, exending from the Grand Canyon into New Mexico, covering an area of from 60 to 80 miles in width and 300 miles in length." The enormous amount of timber on these lands is almost beyond calculation.

Governor Kibbe, of Arizona, in his annual report for 1905, referring to the timber lands of the Territory, says:

> Probably the largest unbroken forest in the world lies within the San Francisco Mountains and Black Mesa Forest Reserves. Its area is estimated at 6,000 square miles, * * * but the timbered area of the northern portion of the Territory stretches to and beyond the Grand Canyon on the north to Bill Williams Mountain on the west, and southward to the great rim where the Colorado plateau breaks to the southern plains. In the Mogallon Mountains * * * there are, in addition to yellow pine, large bodies of oak timber suitable for the manufacture of farm machinery, wagons, etc., and for finishing lumber.

Lands which produce such timber are not arid, and large areas within these timber belts will ultimately be utilized for agricultural purposes.

Those who have sought to minimize the possibilities in agriculture of these great Territories have quoted from statements of the members of scientific bureaus of the Government relative to the probable areas susceptible of irrigation. These statements have, in practically every instance, been limited to the possibilities within the larger valleys, and none of them have taken into consideration or pretended to base their estimate upon the possible or even probable development by the irrigation of small isolated tracts. It is a conservative estimate to say that, in addition to the 2,000,000 acres that will unquestionably be irrigated in the larger irrigable valleys of Arizona and New Mexico, at no distant period there will be at least an equal area that will be irrigated by pumping, by the impounding of flood waters in small reservoirs, and by flood irrigation, and to this aggregate of four or five million acres we must add at least an equal area—probably a considerably larger area—that will be cultivated and farmed without irrigation.

In addition to this are the marvelous possibilities of the Territories in stock raising and dairying. In connection with the discussion of this feature of the situation, some very curious statements have been made. Some time in the past some one seems to have made the very natural remark that grazing animals can not feed the grass of the ranges more than 5 miles on each side of water, and immediately gentlemen whose business and purpose it is to minimize the possibilities of the Territories begin to argue that even the grazing possibilities are limited to strips of territory 10 miles in width along the streams. I would advise gentlemen who have been using that kind of argument to visit the range country of the West and learn what the actual conditions are. One does not need to know much about the habits of grazing animals to know that they can not ordinarily graze more than 5 miles from water. As a matter of fact, that distance is rather beyond a reasonable limit, but everybody knows, who knows anything about the western country that stock water is found to but a limited extent in flowing streams; that over the greater portion of the region stock is watered in water holes, where the water gathers in times of storm, and where these water holes are not found or where there is a likelihood of their drying up during the grazing season, small reservoirs are built, wells are sunk, windmills erected, tanks are constructed, and thus every blade of the valuable grass is eventually utilized. Of all of the arguments that have been used relative to the productive capacities of these Territories, I imagine this 5-mile-grazing argument has most clearly indicated to those who know the facts the lack of knowledge of conditions among those who assume to speak of the possibilities of these Territories.

Not only are the possibilities of growth and development in these two Territories vast and boundless, but they have been developing in the past few years since railways have reached them, since the tide of immigration has been setting toward them, in a way that ought to have stopped the mouths of these carping critics. In the last census Arizona showed a per capita value of farm products higher than that of Ohio, double that of New York, and four times that of Massachusetts. While the increase in value of the farm products of the farms of the entire Union from 1890 to 1900 was only 28 per cent, that of Arizona was 160 per cent; while the increase of the farms of the Union in that decade was 92 per cent, that of Arizona was 470 per cent.

On these arid plains, with the water limitations gentlemen have so eloquently portrayed, there are, in Arizona alone, more sheep than in all New England and more cattle than in half the States of the Union. While she is not asking for admission into the Union at this time, she had even five years ago a greater population than twenty States had when they were admitted, and her percentage of increase in population between 1890 and 1900 exceeded that of any State in the Union. She actually gained more population between 1890 and 1900 than Kansas and Delaware combined, and the percentage of her increase in mineral output for the last five years exceeded that of any American Commonwealth.

These two Territories are forging ahead by leaps and bounds. Their development long delayed by reason of the vast area of fertile lands lying nearer the older settled States, their mineral development retarded by lack of transportation and markets, is now growing with marvelous rapidity. To the doubting Thomases who can see no possibility of future growth and development in these splendid Territories I would commend as a warning the words of faint-hearted statesmen of other days relative to other Territories of the Union, and I look forward to the time in the not distant future when the marvelous development of these Territories will prove how lacking they are in the gift of prophecy. The doleful forbodings of the Josiah Quincys of to-day, remind us of the original Josiah, who, when the great Territory of Louisiana was purchased, filled the Hall of the House of Representatives with his doleful croakings of the destruction of the liberties and property of the people by the admission into the Union of these lands and their inhabitants. They are not the first Representatives in Congress who have seen no good in certain portions of American territory. Arizona and New Mexico look no better to them than Oregon did to some gentlemen of the same disposition who were in the House at the time that Territory was admitted into the Union.

But, Mr. Chairman, in spite of all these lugubrious predictions we have developed and populated the Territory of Louisiana and the State of Oregon; we have even found Alaska, by many gentlemen high in public life at the time of its purchase held to be worthless, of some value. And when in the days to come Arizona and New Mexico, as splendid States of the Union, shall be teeming with a prosperous, intelligent, and industrious population, when their agricultural and mineral resources shall have been developed, when their splendid climate shall have attracted to their borders, as it has already done to a certain extent, vast numbers of the most enlightened and progressive of our people, the descendants of these gentlemen of little faith will see their names coupled in unenviable notoriety with those of the pessimists and croakers of other days, who, like they, have been proven false prophets.

Mr. Chairman, by reason of their isolated location, by reason of the character of their resources requiring unusual time, effort, courage, and enterprise for their development, some portions of the Territory we acquired from Mexico are still but in the morning of their growth; but the pledge, given in good faith when they became a part of our territory—a pledge which has not been overlooked or forgotten by our party platforms—should be kept in good faith. The people of these Territories, the last to come into the Union, are entitled to fair treatment. They have for half a century been developing two American Territories, each along its own line, each with its own traditions, hopes, and aspirations. I have no criticism to make of the people of either Territory. They are, in my opinion, all of them good material for American citizenship, infinitely superior to millions we are getting from abroad, but the people of the two Territories, understanding their differences, prefer to come into the Union separately. We can not afford to ignore their wishes and desires. We can not afford to deny justice to the Southwest. We can not, in view of our traditions, our practices in the past, our promises, deny them an opportunity, if we do no more, to still further develop their region and demonstrate their possibility of growth and development. New Mexico, with her mixture of Spanish and American blood, Arizona, with her splendid citizenship, will each of them make States of which their sisters may well be proud. Let us give them both an opportunity to fully qualify for separate entrance into the sisterhood of States.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to enter into any lengthy discussion of a question which is already practically decided. I simply rise for the purpose of entering my protest against the passage of this bill in its present form. The distinguished chairman of the committee said on yesterday that it was sometimes necessary to use one poison to counteract another, but it seems to me that in the bill now under consideration they have injected too many poisons for a Representative in the American Congress who believe in justice to the people concerned in this legislation to vote for it.

Much has been said in defense of Arizona. Little has been said in regard to the union of the Indian Territory with Oklahoma. I want to explain my position on that question. Rather than not have statehood for the Indian Territory and Oklahoma I should vote for joint statehood between them if that question were submitted to Congress as a separate proposition, but I want to submit that there is serious objection to the admission of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory under the restrictions of the present bill. What is the condition? One part of the new State of Oklahoma will be under Federal jurisdiction to a certain limited extent. One part of the State of Oklahoma will not be under Federal jurisdiction. One part of the State of Oklahoma will be, by virtue of a Federal statute, under prohibition to a limited extent, and another part of the State of Oklahoma will not have prohibition, but will be open so far as the liquor question is concerned.

Mr. HAMILTON. If the gentleman will pardon me, prohibition will not be by Federal statute, but by constitutional enactment.

Mr. FLOYD. I understand it will be a constitutional enactment. If the State goes into the Union under this bill it is required to incorporate into that constitution this question of prohibition.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is true.

Mr. FLOYD. Now, one, and perhaps the most distinguished, leader of the Republican party once said that no nation could exist half slave and half free, and I submit that it is an unjust and unwise provision to require one part of a State to submit to certain laws and another part be left open and free upon that question. But I think, Mr. Chairman, that the wishes of the Indians are entitled to be considered upon this question. What are the desires of the people of the Indian Territory in regard to statehood? If the question was submitted to them, nine-tenths of the population of the Indian Territory would vote for separate statehood for the Indian Territory. I think as they are the wards of the nation, as we have by a policy pursued in the past enabled the Five Civilized Tribes to rise to a high degree of civilization, that their wishes, when it comes to this question of statehood, should be considered.

The distinguished chairman of the committee on yesterday, in closing his remarks in a splendid and eloquent peroration, described this Union of forty-five States, and said he wanted to add two more stars to that glorious flag. When our Pilgrim fathers landed in this country the Indians occupied this vast territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Step by step the white man encroached on their rights until finally, by the negotiation of treaties with their chiefs in Georgia and in Alabama and other portions of the country, the Indian Territory was set apart for them. [Applause.]

It was to be their country, their heritage, to them and their posterity forever. They were permitted under the treaties to make their own laws, govern their local affairs, punish their own criminals, and where the rights of the white man or the Government were not involved for years and years the Government interfered in no way with their local concerns. Under subsequent treaties and by acts of Congress former conditions have been changed, allotments have been made of their land, and on the 4th day of March, 1906, their tribal relations are to cease and the Indian race as a nationality is to die.

The Indian chief, the highest official ruler of the tribe, is to be relegated from authority, and the people of the Indian Territory—the Indians and others who have settled amongst them and intermarried with them—are to assume a new and different relation to the Government than that existing heretofore.

I insist that on account of and by reason of the peculiar conditions existing there, growing out of mixed and varying property rights and former customs, usages, laws, and the habits of industry of these people, it would not be wise and expedient to unite their Territory in a State with Oklahoma. Complications of law, vexed questions of taxation, road making, and other issues will arise that will produce annoyance, disagreements, and antagonisms between the two sections of the Commonwealth that can all be avoided by separate statehood.

We, the people of the United States, have appropriated all the rest of this vast domain, from ocean to ocean, to our own use, except the Indian Territory. Then, why not, in the final adjustment of the question, keep faith with our own treaties made with the Indians, segregate the Indian Territory, their country, to the "noble race and brave," who, notwithstanding occasional cruelty in war, have ever manifested the high and exalted virtues of love of country, love of home, and that inflexible courage and bravery, which never fails to find a sympathetic chord in the hearts of all mankind, whether displayed by a Japanese soldier from the mast of a sinking battle ship or by a brave American boy as he rushes to death in a charge up San Juan Hill, or an Indian warrior in a hand-to-hand contest with the invincible white man.

They desire separate statehood, and I assert, as a Member upon this floor, that the equity of the situation is such and our obligations by treaties are such as to entitle them to it as an act of simple justice. Here I desire to pay a worthy tribute to the Five Civilized Tribes. Under legal conditions and restrictions that have hampered them at every step of their progress, they have builded in their beautiful country a splendid civilization. They have their farms, their factories, their mills, their stores, their schools and churches, and a number of magnificent cities.

My district borders upon their country. Iron posts, set one mile apart, placed there by the Government, mark the line between the Indian Territory and the State of Arkansas; and but for these posts no one traveling through the country could discover the boundary, so similar are the habits, the intelligence, the customs, and the manners of the people on both sides of the line.

These Indians are civilized. I have been among them. I look upon them as neighbors and friends. I am unwilling, therefore, that this act of injustice, as I see it, should be done them without registering my protest against it.

A few months ago they held a constitutional convention at Muskogee, adopted a constitution, and asked Congress to grant them separate statehood under the name of Sequoyah. Their petition has been ignored. Their wishes have been disregarded. I can conclude my remarks on this part of the subject in no more fitting language than to quote the words of the late E. C. Boudinot, a noted Cherokee. Said he:

> You talk of the noble race and brave; you tell how they once paddled their light canoes along your rocky shores, how they dipped their noble limbs into your sedgy lakes; but their wrongs are written in your histories, their names are upon your rivers, and you can not wash them out.

I do not wish to discuss the case of Arizona. It has already been ably discussed by many Members of this House who have spoken in opposition to this bill. I concur in all they have said, and I characterize the action of the majority in their effort to enforce forever an incompatible and unholy union between the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, against their consent and over their protests, as an act of the highest injustice, wholly unjustifiable and utterly indefensible by a people who claim that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

I also desire to protest against the rule reported on this bill and adopted by the majority, which limits debate—in fact, renders debate superfluous, and cuts off the right of amendment to a measure of such grave magnitude as the one under consideration.

At the beginning of Congress our distinguished Speaker, in his speech of acceptance, congratulated the membership of this House upon the fact that this House was the only body under our system of government where the voice of the people could be heard without the intervention of other machinery; and yet in less than two months this House is confronted by the intervention of other machinery, commonly known as a "gag rule," which stifles the voices of the people's Representatives on this floor and prevents the free, fair, and open discussion of a bill which involves the admission or rejection of Territories as sovereign States into our constitutional Union.

No reason has been given for the support of this bill except that it is a party measure. In my opinion, no reason can be given for the support of this bill except that it is a party measure. It has been argued by the gentleman from New York, who spoke in favor of this measure, that if we made four States out of these four Territories it would mean to make four Democratic States, with eight Democratic Senators. I do not know that this argument is well founded; in fact, I do not think it is well founded. I am inclined to the opinion that if the Republican party would deal fairly with the people of these respective Territories that when admitted as States some of them, perhaps all of them, would support the Republican ticket; but if the leaders of the dominant party will pursue persistently and continuously the policy adopted in this instance of overriding the expressed will and wishes of the people for whom and concerning whose rights and liberties they are legislating; if their floor managers will not yield one minute of time to members of their own party who entertain opposite views upon questions of proposed legislation, these same leaders may find in the end that, in their zeal to maintain party supremacy, instead of making four Democratic States with eight Democratic Senators they have pursued a course that has resulted in making many Democratic States with many Democratic Senators.

I know of no more appropriate words in which to conclude these remarks than to add, God speed the day.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman on the other side consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has consumed thirty-eight minutes this morning.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, in a masterly and eloquent argument yesterday, assigned the principal reasons for the adoption of this measure. All we lesser lights can hope to do is to revolve about him as a solar center reflecting the radiance he has shed upon us; and in the performance of that humble yet somewhat important function I desire to call the attention of the committee to certain phases of this question which he, by reason of limited time and the necessity of some degree of generalization, has been unable to present. The gentleman from Arkansas opposes the passage of the bill because it prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for mechanical and medicinal purposes, in the Indian Territory and the Indian reservations in Oklahoma. He contends that it will imperil the stability and prosperity of the new State. He reenforces his statement by the immortal maxim of Lincoln: "A nation can not permanently endure half slave and half free." I insist that the application is not proper, because it is better to encourage sobriety in one-half the State than in none at all. [Applause.]

The committee has inserted a provision in the enabling act requiring the constitutional convention of the new State of Oklahoma to provide for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the present Indian reservations. The constitutionality of that section has been called in question. What power has the Congress to impose a special limitation upon a State? The Supreme Court has held in many cases that the States of the Union are upon an equal footing; that each possesses in the fullest degree all the incidents of State sovereignty. The regulation and control of the liquor traffic is a police power, and therefore exercised by the legislature of the State; and Congress can not reach out into a State and impose any restriction upon that right. But Congress can compel a Territory seeking statehood to insert such a provision in its constitution or deny it admission into the Union. After the Territory becomes a State, however, the people have the power to amend the constitution and strike out such a provision any time they so desire. But if a Territory accepts statehood under such conditions, there is a moral, if not a legal, obligation to maintain it.

The purpose of this prohibitive clause is to carry out the policy of the Federal Government toward the Indians since 1832. The established policy of the nation is to prohibit the sale of liquor among the Indians. The treaties signed by the Dawes Commission with the Five Civilized Tribes, under which their lands have been allotted and under which they have accepted citizenship, provided that—

> The United States agrees to maintain strict laws in the territory of the said nations against the introduction, sale, barter, or giving away of liquors and intoxicants of any kind or quality.

It was understood by the members of the Commission and by the Indians that this treaty promise should be kept sacred by the National Government. It is now the duty of this Government to use all of its powers to fulfill that promise and impose upon the State of Oklahoma the moral responsibility for the accomplishment of that purpose. That section is in line with the nation's established policy and demanded by every consideration of justice to the Indian as he assumes the great responsibility of American citizenship. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Wyoming has portrayed a beautiful picture of the progress and development of the great West. I rejoice with him as the course of empire takes its way to the westward. I can see no reason, however, for apprehension on the part of the West. We are as much interested in the West as in the East. There can be no controversy on fundamental principles between the two sections. He complains that the West is being deprived of representation in the Senate. At this time there is absolutely no foundation for that statement. The other day a gentleman from Arizona stated before the committee that five of the Southwestern States had a greater population than five of the New England States. I have had occasion to compute the population of the eleven Rocky Mountain and Pacific coast States, including New Mexico and Arizona, and that of the eleven next smallest States in the Union, and find the latter almost twice as great. The eleven States of greatest population have 40,000,000 people, in comparison with 4,000,000 of the Western States just mentioned.

The increase in population in each of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois has been greater in the last decade than it has in the eleven Western States. Ohio has as great a population as these States. They have twenty-two United States Senators and Ohio has but two. I submit some interesting statistics to prove to my friend from Wyoming that there is no danger for some centuries to come of representation in the Senate unfair to the West.

Population of eleven Western States and Territories, 1900.

1.	Arizona	122,000
2.	California	1,485,000
3.	Colorado	539,000
4.	Idaho	161,000
5.	Montana	243,000
6.	Nevada	42,000
7.	New Mexico	195,000
8.	Utah	276,000
9.	Washington	518,000
10.	Wyoming	92,000
11.	Oregon	413,000
	Total	4,086,000

Population of the eleven smallest States, 1900.

1.	Connecticut	908,000
2.	Delaware	184,000
3.	Florida	528,000
4.	Maine	694,000
5.	New Hampshire	411,000
6.	Rhode Island	428,000
7.	South Dakota	401,000

Why should the East do injustice to the West? There are 30,000 sons of Ohio now in the State of Colorado. They are in every Western State. They are flesh of our flesh, and there must be no contentions portending future trouble. But we insist that there should be a just and proper proportion between the population of a State applying for admission into the Union and the remainder of the Republic. It does not give it to admit these Territories separately. It does not give it to admit them jointly. But we are willing, in view of the deplorable internal conditions of these Territories, which can only be remedied by the exercise of all the powers of statehood, to admit them as a single State and permit it, as every other member of this Union has done or must do, to work out for itself an equitable internal policy. There must be no sectional feeling. But we insist that you shall not substitute hills for homes and mountains for men. [Applause.]

We do not object to the quality of your citizenship. There can be none nobler. We simply say the proper proportion is not maintained. Some patriot, in eulogizing American manhood, said:

God sifted seven nations of Europe to get good seed to sow in this virgin soil, and it has produced a magnificent standard of manhood, but still Columbia sings:

"Give me men to match my mountains,
Give me men to match my plains,
Men with empires in their bosoms
And new eras in their brains;
Men to right earth's wrongs
And to cleanse old error's fen.
Give me men to match my mountains,
Give me men!"

We are pleased to accept your majestic mountains as metaphorical of men, but we pause at the substitution of mountains for men. [Applause.] Now, the gentleman from Texas contends that there are social, industrial, and sentimental reasons for not uniting these Territories. The evidence before the committee discloses that they have precisely the same school system and code of laws. Arizona is now adopting the sanitary laws of New Mexico. They have dubbed the Mexican a "greaser." It is an opprobrious epithet, defamatory of Mexican character, and repudiated by the Americans in New Mexico. If the people of Arizona can live under the sanitary provisions of the Mexican, I can't see the force of any serious objection to any other part of their statutory law. They say the people of New Mexico and of Arizona can not mingle in friendly relations. Can not amalgamate. Why? Have not the Americans in New Mexico mingled with the Mexicans there? Are not the Americans in New Mexico of the same character as the people of Arizona? They have sent a distinguished gentleman, Mr. Rodey, up here as a Delegate for the past ten years to plead their cause. He is a grand son of the Emerald Isle, a man of high character and splendid ability. He has labored with patriotic devotion for the cause of his people, and I trust that when this new star shall illumine the flag, as a reward for the services rendered, he will be given a seat in the United States Senate. [Applause.] If men of such character can mingle with the Mexicans of New Mexico, why can not the people of Arizona? There are no social conditions that would bar them from coming in closer touch and enjoying together the blessings of statehood.

Area is not the prime consideration for statehood. Present population and industry combined with their future possibilities constitute the chief qualification. The charge that the proposed State is too large is given complete refutation by the preservation of the territorial integrity of Texas for over a half century in the face of a clause in the enabling act granting the power to establish five different States. But it is asserted that State pride and local sentiment sustains Texas intact; that division of her great domain would despoil her heroic history. I understand the force of sentiment. I understand that popular opinion can be crystallized into a veritable Niagara of social or political power that can agitate a nation to its profoundest depths. But sentiment must be sustained by reason and justice or it can not permanently endure. A great portion of New Mexico and even of Colorado belonged originally to Texas. When your State applied for admission her territory extended beyond the line of the Missouri Compromise, not far from the 42° north latitude. What has become of the sentiment of the people living in those sections? They had fought for the freedom of Texas. They had helped her establish an independent republic. Have they ceased to love the Lone Star State because they do not live within her limits? No. Her heroic history, her hallowed associations and sacred memories are just as dear to them as they are to a son of Texas. Every life sacrificed for the glory of that flag is just as sacred as every other life. State lines can not lessen our love of heroic deeds. As long as the flag of the great Republic floated from the heights of New Mexico's mountains they were not greatly concerned about the territorial subdivision in which they should exercise the rights and privileges of American citizenship.

Conditions are so deplorable in these Territories that the people should be given power to institute a new order. They can not successfully battle against existing evils until commissioned by the Republic. The inequalities of taxation are simply intolerable and perhaps account for the attitude of the railroads in this controversy. I desire to insert in the RECORD a computation I have made showing that the railroads all but escape taxation in the Territories. What is true of railroad property applies with equal force to the mining interests of Arizona.

There is only one way to overcome those adverse conditions. Give them statehood. Give the people power to establish a new internal policy—a permanent policy—not subject to Federal supervision, but supreme in all the incidents of State sovereignty, and in due time a system of laws will be formulated and adopted requiring every interest to bear its just and equal share of the public burden and enforcing justice among all men alike.

In the process of readjustment between the two Territories there may be conflicting interests. There doubtless will be. But these will be submerged by the patriotic endeavor to build wisely for the coming generations like the master minds that wrought out the Republic. They will soon become accustomed to the new relationship. The bond of common interest will bind them together. Common hopes and common aspirations will harmonize all discordant elements. Sentiment will focus about a new and nobler standard, and in the achievement of a grand common destiny they will raise up in the great Southwest a State rivaling Texas in imperial dominion, California in diversity of industry and variety of products, and shall sustain an unsullied citizenship worthy of the new century, a standard of manhood that will "match in majesty America's mountains," a State worthy of a star on the flag of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CAPRON].

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Chairman, I do not approach the discussion of this subject with any fear that I shall do violence to the real desires or wishes of the people of Arizona or New Mexico. If government should be by consent of the governed, I will ask my friends discussing this question upon the other side how it happens that they so readily override the wishes which are presented here by men now in this city who assert that the joining of the Indian Territory and Oklahoma is an outrage also? Every man who has spoken on the other side has said that he perfectly agreed to that, while these gentlemen say that the great State of Sequoyah—you have all heard of that State before, I reckon—ought to have its separate statehood and does not want and protests against being joined to Oklahoma. Now, then, this joining of people together is like the mingling of the waters of a river. They may be discolored for a little at the confluence, but they become one stream, and in a little time, a year or so from the time this statehood act is accomplished, you and I well know that this people will be satisfied and proud of the jointure, and that those people who are desiring the offices will have obtained them, and that the greater Arizona will begin its career as one of the great States of this Union to prosper as other States have prospered.

We know that she will succeed according to the measure of her possessions in minés and in agriculture, and we will be glad. We are giving them this day the opportunity to say whether or not they wish to become a sovereign State in this great Republic of Commonwealths. Let us not for a moment think we are doing violence to the rights of either of these Territories. It would be an outrage if this Congress were to permit half of the people of Arizona to deprive the balance of the people of the two Territories the opportunity to obtain the blessings of statehood. Why, the late census gives the population of Arizona as 123,000 and that of New Mexico as 195,000, a total of 318,000. One-half of the people of Arizona, or 62,000, would leave 256,000 people to be outraged by 62,000. They will be glad and will thank us later for what we are doing to-day, and now, as I may not go into detail in this discussion, which has been so amply considered already, I am going to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] if he will state, as he stated in my presence within a few hours, the exact conditions which existed regarding the admission of the State of Iowa and the State of Maine into statehood, and to say whether it is a unique and unusual way of doing violence to the people who come here objecting. I will now yield to the gentleman from Iowa to answer my question. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think a great deal is said about the wishes of the people of the Territories with reference to expected statehood that is imaginary upon the part of those who spoke. I lived in a Territory at the time we passed from Territorial existence to statehood. I know that it required three distinct efforts to force the people of Iowa into statehood. It was not desired by the great mass of the people, and I undertake to say that the mass of people of the State of Arizona that is to be are quite careless about the matter. Two or three times the people of Iowa voted down a proposition for statehood. Three or four times the people of Maine voted down a proposition for statehood. In neither instance were those Territories dragooned into the Union until after the political parties in the State and in the Union aided in bringing about that result. The national parties were interested in Maine, because at that time there must be an equipoise preserved in the Senate between those States that recognized slavery and those that did not, and when a slave State was brought in a free State must be added. The controversy about Missouri, the controversy of 1820, began in 1819, and it was necessary that Maine should be forced into the Union in order that this equilibrium in the other body should be preserved, and, therefore, the party in power in the Government aided the ambitious partisans in the State who desired to be governors and judges and Senators, and through the combined power, by a small majority, Maine was induced to accept a constitution. So it was in the State of Iowa. The majority on the third or fourth occasion, after it had been voted down on two or three occasions, where statehood was the only issue, was, according to my recollection, less than a thousand—eight hundred and something. Nearly a majority of the people were opposed to statehood, and yet it was forced upon them——

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Was any effort ever made by anybody to compel the people of the Territory of Iowa or the Territory of Maine to come into the Union in connection with some other country against their wishes? Was their will not supreme when they expressed their judgment at the polls?

Mr. HEPBURN. My impression is, Mr. Chairman, that the case at bar and the case with Iowa are precisely similar in effect. I say but a few more than a majority in the State of Iowa were in favor of statehood. Nearly a majority were opposed to it, and after a canvass, mind you, and after the people had spoken, mind you, and after there were truthful returns as to public sentiment, mind you. I am not willing to permit the gentleman from Minnesota to speak for the people of Arizona. In the instance in which I said the people of Iowa spoke for themselves and recorded their voice, and when that voice was heard it was their voice—not the voice of a Representative a thousand miles away.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is what Arizona asks now, and all she asks.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will not permit a Representative, not from Minnesota, but from Wisconsin, to express his judgment about the sentiment of the people of that country, will he permit the political conventions of all parties in the Territory, fifty-three out of fifty-five newspapers of that Territory, the church organs, and——

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to have any reasonable question put to me, but I submit to the gentleman that he can not be permitted to inject the delayed portion of his yesterday's speech into mine. [Laughter.] It very often happens, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman [Mr. HAMILTON] has control of the time, I would be glad if he would give me five minutes more.

Mr. HAMILTON. Can the gentleman manage with three minutes more?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON. Then he may have five minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, it has been a frequent and universal custom in the admission of States for the Government to fix the boundaries. When the State of Iowa was admitted, or prior to its admission, the eastern half of South Dakota, the eastern two-thirds of North Dakota, the whole of Minnesota west of the Mississippi River was a part of the Territory, but those people in Minnesota and in the Dakotas—very few in the Dakotas and not very many in Minnesota—were cut off without being consulted at all. They had no voice in the matter whatever. And I undertake to say that the proportion of this dissent in the State of Iowa to admission into the Union was fully as great as will be the dissent should a vote be taken in the new Territory of New Mexico and Arizona. We had within 800 of a majority against statehood. I believe that the majority of the people there are in favor of statehood, although there may be a large minority that is opposed. Some methods have to be taken to determine how this is to be done. And the voice of the majority will control.

Mr. JAMES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]?

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no method that can be adopted that will be satisfactory to all the people of any of the Territories.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would prefer not to do so. I have only a moment, and I would like to finish the thought which I have. The people of this new State will have their day in court. They will have the opportunity to negative this whole proposition if they see fit to do so. They are not to be dragged into the Union, as has been done many times, without an opportunity for assent or dissent. They are to speak. And are we to make a change in their exception in determining who is to govern? In this land of ours the voice of the majority has been enthroned as our king. It is the voice of the majority that speaks authoritatively. Is not the voice of the majority to be heard in this instance? Why should an exception be made here that the people of Iowa did not have the benefit of, or that the people of Maine did not have the benefit of? Are these gentry in this new southern Territory of a different mental mold, that some other rule must be established for them that is not applied equally to the common people of the land? I want them to have all their rights, and no more. And if the majority is against this coming into the Union, then let them stay out; but if the majority is in favor of it, those that live within those limits territorial, that the Congress alone has the right to fix, if the majority within that jurisdiction want to come in, that is the rule, and they ought to come. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Can the gentleman on the other side use some of their time now?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] fifteen minutes of time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested and amused on yesterday in the discussion of the three bosses on the Republican side and in their efforts in their discussion to impress the Republican Members that this bill, providing for the jointure of New Mexico and Arizona as one State, is a "party measure." Be it said to their credit, there were forty-three Republicans who could not be driven and whipped into any such position, but voted with the Democrats in their opposition to the passage of the "gag" rule, which passed this House on yesterday by a majority of twenty-seven. Mr. Chairman, when the time comes that some historian shall write the history of yesterday's struggle on the floor of this House, if he be true to his duty and to his task, he will record that the forty-three "insurgent" Republicans were orthodox Republicans, and that the majority have broken their party platform pledges. Now, why do I say this? I hold in my hand a book containing all the Republican platforms adopted by that party since its formation. Let me read for the edification of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, who seem to have forgotten their solemn pledges made in their great conventions, what four national Republican conventions have said on the subject of statehood for Arizona and New Mexico. The first reference to that subject by that party was sixteen years ago in their convention which nominated Benjamin Harrison for President. Listen to the language:

The pending bills in the Senate for acts to enable the people of Washington, North Dakota, and Montana Territories to form constitutions and establish State governments should be passed without unnecessary delay.

Now, mark the following strong language:

The Republican party pledges itself to do all in its power to facilitate the admission of the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Idaho, and Arizona to the enjoyment of self-government as States.

That was in 1888. Then they promised in clear and unmistakable language single statehood for New Mexico and Arizona. Now you are violating that pledge and undertaking to force New Mexico and Arizona to coalesce and form one State only. Let us examine the Republican platform of 1892 and see what the "grand old party" pledged itself in regard to these Territories then. Here is the language, and I ask the other side of the House, who are attempting to make joint statehood a party measure, to listen to your platform and see how you are now trying to reverse it:

We favor the admission of the remaining Territories at the earliest practicable date.

That is your platform in 1892. Let us go a step further and see what your party platform contained on this subject in 1896. Here is the language:

We favor the admission of the remaining Territories at the earliest practicable date.

This is an exact reaffirmation of your platform of 1892. But let us examine your declaration on this subject made in your party convention in 1900, when Mr. McKinley was nominated for President and Mr. Roosevelt for Vice-President. This is the last deliverance of the Republican party in convention assembled on this question of statehood:

We favor home rule for and early admission to statehood of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here are four distinct declarations of the Republican party, in their national platforms, declaring in favor of single statehood for these two great Territories. Therefore I take it that single statehood is the Republican party's policy on the question of these two Territories; but there is a little coterie of Republicans in this House who have undertaken to make joint statehood a party question, and are trying—and will succeed in their efforts—to force Republican Members to nullify their platform promises on that subject for the last eighteen years. This handful of bosses have passed the word along and have cracked their whip, and no timid soul will dare oppose them, but with the docility of a child will cast their votes on this great question affecting the sovereignty of two States of the Union as they are told to cast them.

Who has undertaken to make this a party question? A strong hand in the White House, an able ally in the Speaker's chair, and an obedient majority on the Rules Committee! That is the source of the political pabulum that makes joint statehood a party question! It is a humiliating spectacle to see strong men with big minds, on the Republican side, who are violently opposed to this measure, run to cover and vote for it when a half dozen men crack a whip and tell them it is the party lash that descends upon their backs.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let me state to the gentleman we did pass this bill giving separate statehood by Republican votes in this House.

Mr. WEBB. That is so. That was done upon a unanimous report of the Committee on Territories, whose chairman, Mr. Knox, was a Republican from Massachusetts, in the Fifty-seventh Congress. But, Mr. Chairman, pertaining to the idea of Executive influence in the passage of this unjust and reprehensible measure, let me say that I was pained the day before yesterday to read in the public press of the 23d instant, on the front page, and in bold letters, the following:

PRESIDENT LABORS WITH INSURGENTS.

Administration influence is being exerted in a heroic attempt to-day to save the joint-statehood bill, which the insurgents of the House threaten to bludgeon to-morrow, with the assistance of the Democrats under JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS'S leadership. A number of insurgents were summoned to the White House, and there given some straight talk by the President, who is mightily interested in the passage of the measure.

Mr. Chairman, could such information reach the long-departed spirit of George Washington, whose body lies over yonder at Mount Vernon, it would disturb his peaceful rest and cause him to turn over in his grave. Such news would make the spirit of Thomas Jefferson groan in disapproval. It was the intention of our fathers that the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of this Government should be kept separate and distinct. The powers and functions of these departments are defined in three distinct articles of the Constitution, and so careful were the founders of this Republic to keep these three departments separate and distinct, and avoid the influence of the executive upon the legislative department, that they actually built the White House, the Executive Mansion, more than a mile from the Capitol.

Luther Henry Porter, of New Jersey, in his Constitutional History of the United States, says:

The Government of the Constitution, being national, required three distinct departments: The legislative, to form laws; the executive, to execute them; and the judicial, to interpret them and apply them in case of doubt. These departments are independent of each other so long as they are true to their duties. The independence of the three departments of each other renders each responsible to the Constitution and to the people.

The Constitution permits the President to recommend to Congress in his annual message such legislation as he thinks should be enacted, and it also gives him the right to veto such legislation as he thinks should not be enacted. But it was never intended that the executive head of this Government, with his powerful influence through the dispensation of patronage, should use this influence in privately and personally causing members of this sovereign legislature to vote for any measure. The three great departments under our Constitution—the legislative, executive, and judicial—are the magnificent trinity upon which the fabric of this Republic rests. The three departments, separate and distinct from each other, are the pillars upon which our Government is founded; and when one of these pillars is destroyed, by usurpation or otherwise, then the entire foundation, builded by our fathers, will become useless, and this splendid Republic of ours will crumble and decay. Has the time come, Mr. Chairman, when this House of Representatives is but an arm of the Executive, a mere handmaid to the President? What would the world think if the Members of this Congress should summon before the bar of this House the nine great jurists who sit on the Supreme Court bench, and demand of them that they should declare a certain act of Congress constitutional because they had passed it and were interested in it? It would shock every man from one end of the country to the other. I protest, Mr. Chairman, that these three great distinct departments under the Constitution should be kept distinct, even though Theodore Roosevelt is President of this Republic.

Mr. POWERS. Can the gentleman distinguish between a question of party policy, on a measure of this kind, and a question of constitutional law?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; I can and do make this distinction, but I did not know that the President is your party and makes your party platforms. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the analogy is a correct one, and I am arguing that no one of these three great departments should undertake to bring pressure to bear on the other to influence it in its action, except in the manner pointed to in the Constitution itself.

On May 7, 1902, Mr. Rodey, the Republican Delegate in this House from New Mexico, discussing the bill for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as separate States, said:

> If it be a political one, I contend that New Mexico has the political qualification, but I also contend that he who places the rights of American citizens upon a partisan basis is unworthy to enjoy the privilege of American citizenship. [Applause.] Every man on the floor will repudiate his political platform for the last generation, be he Democrat or Republican, if he votes in opposition to this bill.

That, Mr. Chairman, was at a time when the Republican party presented to the House a bill which is just the opposite to the one we are now considering. They then presented a bill for separate statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, and it was passed by that Congress unanimously; but three years later we find them reversing their position, and forcing through this House a bill to make New Mexico and Arizona one State.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill, which provides that the great Territories of New Mexico and Arizona shall be merged into one State, because the people of New Mexico do not want it. In October, 1901, a great convention was held in that Territory, at which ringing resolutions were adopted favoring single statehood. The legislature of that Territory has passed strong resolutions protesting against being joined to Arizona. Mr. Rodey, the Republican Delegate from that Territory, in May, 1902, said on the floor of this House:

> We don't want to be joined to Arizona with the Rocky Mountains between us. Arizona is on the Pacific slope and New Mexico is on the Atlantic slope of the continent. The Continental Divide runs between New Mexico and Arizona north and south. There is nothing in common between the people of the two Territories save their splendid western spirit of enterprise. Such a provision as that of the gentleman from Indiana (that they join the two Territories as one State) would mix the conditions of these peoples in such a manner that they would never extricate themselves.

I am aware that Mr. Rodey now says that his people would accept joint statehood, but it is because, and I assert it as a fact, this Congress has browbeaten them into believing that they will never get single statehood. The chief executive of New Mexico, Governor Otero, uses this language in regard to the proposed jointure of the two Territories:

> There is no doubt that the great majority of the people of New Mexico are opposed to joining New Mexico with Arizona under one Commonwealth, as is proposed by pending legislation. Even the small percentage who would acquiesce in such legislation prefer single statehood for each Territory. This is not due to any innate animosity between the two Territories, but to the inherent differences in the population, in legislation, in industries, and from historical and ethnologic standpoints, not to mention that the consolidation of two Commonwealths like New Mexico and Arizona into one is unprecedented in American history. The new State would be an unnatural and unwilling alliance. It would be a coercion of two populations which are unlike in character, in ambition, and largely in occupation. The union would be abhorrent to both.

There is no man who would stand on the floor of this House and claim that the people of New Mexico prefer joint statehood. Even the chairman of this committee will admit, and I see him sitting before me, and I challenge him to deny it, that if the people of New Mexico were permitted to decide between joint statehood and single statehood 99 per cent would vote for single statehood. Your Republican governor of New Mexico says the people of his Territory don't want it, and he is supposed to know the sentiments of his people. Mr. Rodey, upon whom the chairman of this committee bestowed so much praise on yesterday, and I join in the spirit of that praise, declared three years ago that the people did not want it, and I submit that Mr. Rodey is qualified to know and does know the sentiments of the people of his Territory as well or better than any man in it.

I am opposed to this proposition to join New Mexico and Arizona because the people of Arizona are violently opposed to it. I say without fear of any contradiction, and I challenge any Member to deny it, that 98 per cent of the people of Arizona are not only opposed to this jointure with New Mexico, but are unalterably and passionately opposed to it. Now, listen again to Mr. Rodey, to what he said in the House three years ago, and I like to quote from him because he is such distinguished authority. At that time the motion had been made to join the two Territories as one State, which motion was voted down by a Republican Congress by 106 to 28. On this motion to combine the two Territories Mr. Rodey said:

> Arizona does not want to be joined to New Mexico. It has forty years of its own history behind it. It has its own county debts. It has its own municipal debts. It has its own Territorial debt. New Mexico does not want to be joined to Arizona, and its people are opposed to this amendment. We would never adopt a constitution under such a bill.

Governor Brodie, of Arizona, another Republican executive, appointed by the President, in his report of 1904 says:

> I can not add to the protest that has already been made by the people of the Territory of Arizona against this reprehensible measure (joint statehood with New Mexico), and I have only to say that they would desire that their Commonwealth remain a Territory indefinitely rather than be joined to New Mexico.

Another chief executive, Governor Kibbey, of Arizona, in 1905, having succeeded Governor Brodie, says, among many other arguments against joint statehood:

> The proposed union is regarded by our people as a menace to the prosperity and progress of the Territory.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the governors of these Territories are Republicans and Republican appointees?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; of course. They are Republicans, and I suppose that they express Republican sentiments, which ought to influence the Republicans in this House.

The Committee on Territories, of which committee I am a member, has had this bill for the jointure of these two Territories under consideration for more than a month, and during that time we have received petitions with thousands upon thousands of names upon them from the people of Arizona protesting against this crime which you are about to commit. They are not asking statehood for Arizona. They are praying that you permit them to remain a Territory indefinitely rather than tie them up with New Mexico. They do not ask for statehood. We have had before our committee from Arizona men from all the walks of life—farmers, ranchmen, lawyers, ministers, newspaper editors; in fact, men representing every profession—and every one of them has protested in bitter terms against being united with New Mexico. These citizens paid their way to Washington, some 3,000 miles, and have come before this our committee, in this Congress, begging us, praying us, imploring us in God's name not to ram down their throats this detestable legislation. [Applause.]

In the face of all these earnest protests you Republican majority are going to pass this bill, and tell the people of these two Territories that they have got to accept against their will this distasteful and unnatural marriage. You will not even permit the people of Arizona and New Mexico a single vote upon the proposition of jointure. If you would permit such an amendment, allowing each Territory to vote on it separately, there would be scarcely any opposition to this bill, but no, you are afraid that the proposition would be overwhelmingly voted down in each Territory.

General Sampson, one of the petitioners before our committee, a former foreign minister to Ecuador, told the committee that in order to test the sentiment of the people of the Territory in which he lived he carried around a petition asking this Congress not to put upon Arizona this jointure bill. He approached 1,009 persons, and out of that number only 7 declined to sign, while 1,002 signed it with enthusiasm. Not long ago there was a great meeting in Phoenix, Ariz., composed of citizens from all over that Territory and mayors from all the towns. That convention passed ringing resolutions against the proposed legislation of joining these two Territories. Yet you are going to disregard the feelings of this people and force this bill upon them. The offense which gave rise to the Boston tea party was an insignificant bagatelle as compared to the crime of passing this bill against the unanimous wishes of the people whom it affects.

I am opposed to this bill, again, to join these Territories, Mr. Chairman, on another ground—because when the Territory of

New Mexico was ceded by old Mexico to the United States, in the ninth section of the treaty ceding this Territory, which treaty was ratified in 1848 at Guadalupe Hidalgo, there occurs the following:

Mexicans who, in the Territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the meantime shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

It will be seen from reading this section that the United States morally promised separate statehood to New Mexico; and so thoroughly was this understood that in 1850, when California, which was a part of the ceded Territory, elected her United States Senators and Representative, New Mexico did likewise. The representatives from both Territories presented themselves to Congress. The Senators and Representative from California were retained, while the Senators from New Mexico were sent back home and their Representative was allowed to remain as a Delegate from that Territory. Away back in 1846, when General Kearny marched into this Territory and hauled down the flag of old Mexico at Santa Fe and hoisted the flag of the United States, he said to the vast company of people assembled:

It is the wish and intention of the United States to provide for New Mexico a free government, with the least possible delay, similar to those in the United States.

Ever since that good hour New Mexico has been knocking, knocking at the door of this Congress for admission to statehood, and asking that you carry out the obligation made both by our victorious general and by treaty. Three years ago, in discussing this very statehood question, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] took the position, and argued it strongly for one hour, that no Territory had a right to become a State. In his speech on yesterday he agreed that he would yield always his wisdom to that of his national party convention. Now, the Republican convention of 1860 said that Kansas, as of right, should be made a State. In 1889 the Republican national convention declared again that North Dakota, as of right, should be admitted into the Union as a State. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Shively v. Bowlby (57 U. S.), says:

Upon the question of territory acquired by the United States, whether by cession from one of the States, or by treaty with a foreign country, or by discovery and settlement, the same title and dominion passed to the United States for the benefit of the whole people and in trust for the several States to be ultimately created out of the territory.

The court, in the same opinion, says again:

Such Territories are held with the object, as soon as their population and condition justifies, of being admitted into the Union as States.

So, as soon as the population and conditions of a Territory justify it, at that moment such Territory has a right to demand statehood. I will show a little further along in this argument that New Mexico does possess these requisites.

I am opposed to this jointure, Mr. Chairman, because the Congress of the United States promised single statehood to Arizona when that Territory was created in 1863. The following is part of the language of the act of Congress passed February 24, 1863, in reference to the Arizona Territory:

That said government (that is, the government of the Territory of Arizona) shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in such Territory shall have the consent of Congress to form a State government, republican in form, as prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and apply for and obtain admission into the Union as a State.

That is the distinct promise on the part of Congress—and this bill was signed by Abraham Lincoln—that when Arizona shall be admitted into the Union it shall come in as a single State and not joined to another Territory. The people of the Territory, who have gone there and irrigated her lands, made gardens of her valleys, and constructed the foundation of a great State, have acted upon this promise of Congress in good faith, and now they ask that this promise be kept. The people of that Territory say to this Congress now that, if you do not think they are at present qualified for statehood, all well and good; they will not complain, but will continue to develop it until you do think it worthy to come into the sisterhood of States. Mark you, gentlemen, Arizona is not asking for statehood. She is asking to be let alone, and only that. Each of these two Territories is capable of developing and promises to develop into a great and worthy State. There is scarcely a State in the Union whose resources are greater or more boundless and promising than those of New Mexico and Arizona. Their resources already excel the resources of several States of the Union. The wealth of Arizona is about $300,000,000. She has 10 national banks, 18 territorial banks. She has as fine schools as will be found in any State of the Union. She has 50 newspapers, a good proportion of which are dailies, and 1,500 miles of railroad. Her churches are among the best and her people are members thereof. She has valleys within her domain that would support vaster populations than we find to-day in many of the older States. The wealth of New Mexico is about $329,000,000. She has 32 banks, 3,000 miles of railroad, and coal with an estimated value of $10,000,000,000. A great State could be founded upon her timber, coal, and coke resources alone. She to-day has valleys as fertile and productive as that of the Nile, and which are capable of sustaining millions upon millions of people.

Mr. Chairman, Congress has proven over and over again that New Mexico ought to be admitted as a State separately, for bills admitting her as a separate State have passed one or the other branches of this Congress seventeen times during the last twenty-five years. A similar bill for the admission of Arizona as a separate State into the Union has passed one or the other branches of this Congress seven times. The Fifty-seventh Congress emphatically declared against joining the two Territories as one State. Mr. KNOX, of Massachusetts, who was chairman of the Committee on Territories in that Congress, presented a bill for single statehood for these two Territories with a unanimous report from the committee. While considering the bill Mr. OVERSTREET, of Indiana, offered an amendment—and it is the first time in the history of the country that such an amendment was offered—to join the two Territories as one State. After lengthy discussion upon the question the motion to join the two Territories was overwhelmingly voted down, and the bill for single statehood for each Territory passed this body by a unanimous vote.

These two Territories should not be joined as one State for another reason. The great Rocky Mountain range separates them, and presents an almost impassable barrier to the peoples of the two Territories, which will for all time prevent the commingling and intercourse necessary to make their feelings one. This great mountain chain, averaging about 7,000 feet in height, is said to be impassable except at two points, where railroads now cross it, and it is 250 miles between these two points. What would be thought of the proposition to join North Carolina and Tennessee into one State, with the Appalachian Mountains between them? Yet such a proposition is insignificant as compared to the union of Arizona and New Mexico. New Mexico alone has 33,000 square miles more territory than North Carolina and Tennessee combined. In other words, you could carve out of New Mexico a boundary the size of North Carolina and Tennessee, and still there would be room enough in New Mexico to form the States of Connecticut, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Vermont, and Rhode Island. You could carve out of Arizona a territory as large as North Carolina and Tennessee combined, and you would still have an area left in Arizona larger than Delaware, Maryland, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island combined.

If you pass this bill providing for the State capital to be located at Santa Fe, as is proposed in the bill, there are people in Arizona who will have to travel more than a thousand miles to get to the seat of government. From Bisbee, Ariz., to Santa Fe, it is 891 miles; from Douglas, Ariz., to Santa Fe, it is 917 miles; from Nogales, Ariz., to Santa Fe, it is 898 miles, and from Phoenix, the present capital of the Territory of Arizona, to Santa Fe, is 679 miles, a distance farther than from Washington, D. C., to Atlanta, Ga. You will compel many of the people of Arizona, in order to get to their capital, to travel a distance farther than that from New York to Chicago. I am therefore opposed to this bill joining these two Territories, because they are too large an area for one State, and jointly would make an empire in extent. The imagination can scarcely grasp their tremendous area. New Mexico, with an area of 123,000 square miles, and Arizona, with an area of 113,000 square miles, making a total of 236,000 square miles, constitute twice the area of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland combined. You could carve out of this combined territory an area equal to the Republic of France, and still there would enough remain to make three States the size of Massachusetts and keep Delaware as a good-sized farm. The total area of these two Territories is larger than the combined area of the Kingdoms of Spain and Portugal. It is more extensive than the German Empire by 27,000 square miles, and more than three-fourths the size of the Republic of Chile.

New Mexico alone is larger than Switzerland, Cuba, Denmark, and Liberia combined. It lacks only 24,000 square miles of being as large as the Kingdom of Japan. It is only 24,000 square miles less than the Republic of Paraguay, and is about equal in area to the Philippine Islands. It is larger than the Kingdom of Italy and the States of New Jersey and Connecticut all combined, and it is larger than Austria by 8,000 square miles. It lacks but 3,000 square miles of being as large as Hungary, and it is nearly three times the size of Cuba. New Mexico is equal to fifteen States the size of Massachusetts, and equal to twelve States the size of Vermont, and thirteen States the size of New Hampshire. It is larger by one hundred and seventeen times than the State of Rhode Island. It is equal to twenty-five States the size of Connecticut, sixteen States the size of New Jersey, and nearly three States the size of Pennsylvania.

Arizona alone is larger than Korea, the Netherlands, and Belgium combined. It is equal in area to Greece, Switzerland, Denmark, the Netherlands, and Portugal combined. It is two and a half times as large as Cuba, larger than Italy, and but 3,000 square miles smaller than Austria. More than one hundred States the size of Rhode Island could be placed in her borders, and there would be enough left to make a State the size of Massachusetts.

These peoples should not be forced into becoming citizens of one State, because the two Territories are of separate races, possessing different ideas, ideals, laws, customs, aspirations, habits, and language. A large proportion of the population of New Mexico is of the Latin race, while almost the whole population of Arizona is of American blood. Arizona women rarely ever marry Mexican men, and very few Anglo-Saxon men ever marry Mexican women. There is a race antipathy between the two people which can not be eradicated by all the laws you can pass, and it is unwise in any legislation in any country to undertake to force a mixture of two separate and distinct races.

It is a well-established rule by Congress in all the past, which almost amounts to a law, in admitting Territories to statehood, that every Territory has been admitted to statehood when she had a reasonable claim from the standpoint of area, population, wealth, and intelligence. Measured by these standards, New Mexico and Arizona should not be joined, but each should be admitted to separate statehood. I have shown you that their wealth and resources are sufficient to maintain great States. There are twenty States in the Union whose populations were less at the time of their admission than that of New Mexico. There are many which at the time of their admission had only a small proportion of the wealth that New Mexico has now.

When Ohio was admitted into the Union in 1802, with 40,000 square miles of area, she had but 60,000 population, and her banking capital in 1803 was only $203,000, while in 1811 she had but four banks, with a capital of less than $1,000,000. New Mexico has thirty-two banks and Arizona twenty-eight, and each of the Territories has a banking capital of more than $1,000,000, while New Mexico has a population of 350,000 and Arizona has a population of 165,000. Take the State of Michigan, when it was admitted into the Union in 1837. She had 56,000 square miles of territory, with 135,000 people, and one year after her admission she had only eleven banks, with $1,400,000 capital stock. Measured by every standard heretofore fixed in admitting States, each of these Territories, and especially New Mexico, is entitled to separate statehood. The average population of the original thirteen States at the time of the formation of the Union was 302,000. The average population of the thirty-two States admitted since that time was at the time of their admission 129,500. The average population of the entire forty-five States of the Union at the time they came into statehood was 157,000. It will be seen that New Mexico has more population to-day than the average original thirteen States had at the time they came into the Union, nearly three times as much population as the average of the thirty-two States, and more than twice as much as the average of the forty-five States.

The average area of the thirteen original States is 24,100 square miles. The average area of the thirty-two States admitted since the Union was formed is 73,600 square miles, and the average area of the entire forty-five States is 60,000 square miles. It will thus be seen that New Mexico has five times the area of the average of the original thirteen States and twice the average area of the forty-five States.

The percentage of illiteracy in New Mexico and Arizona, and especially in Arizona, is very, very small, and is rapidly becoming less. Each of the Territories has spent millions of dollars in the last few years in erecting and maintaining their public schools. They have their universities, their normal schools, their State capitols, and their penitentiaries, and all other public buildings which are necessary to the maintenance of a State.

Mr. Chairman, let it not be forgotten that we are legislating for the future, and the argument of Senatorial representation in favor of passing this jointure bill should be the strongest argument against it and in favor of separate statehood. This vast area of United States soil is entitled to be made into two Commonwealths, if not now, yet at some future time, and represented by four Senators.

Remember that two-thirds of the area of the United States is west of the Mississippi River, and this two-thirds area has now but 38 Senators, while the other one-third, east of the Mississippi River, has 54 Senators. We should have more Senators from the West to effect a Senatorial balancing in the Senate. New Mexico is as large as Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and New York combined. If the argument as to Senatorial representation were a just one—but it is not, for Senators represent the sovereign entity of a State—it might be contended with force that Rhode Island, with only a thousand miles of area, which, as some one has said, would scarcely make a respectable cow lot for New Mexico, and with only 345,000 inhabitants, and two Senators, should be wiped from the map as a State and annexed to Massachusetts, because New York, with her 48,000 square miles of territory and 7,000,000 people, has only two Senators. The same argument could be made for the abrogation of the State of Vermont, which has but 332,000 people and possesses two Senators, while New York has twenty times as many people and five times the area and also has but two Senators. The wisdom of the fathers of this Republic never based the admission of a new State into the Union upon the ground of Senatorial representation, but upon the sovereignty of each sovereign State. It was not done when the Dakotas were divided and given four Senators instead of two, and an unjust discrimination should not now be made to the detriment of the two great Commonwealths of New Mexico and Arizona.

But no word of mine can prevent you Republican majority from committing this great offense, and it will not be the only time within the last fifty years that you have committed a political crime under the guise of party necessity.

Force this bill upon the peoples of these two Territories, ram it down their throats against their wills, refuse them the right to vote separately upon this legislation, and I tell you that you have committed the most monstrous political crime that your party has been guilty of since the days of reconstruction. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 5023. An act granting an increase of pension to August Westfield; and

H. R. 1056. An act granting a pension to Galon S. Clevenger.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inform the Senate whether changed conditions necessitate a change of project for the main breakwater of the harbor of refuge at Point Judith, Rhode Island; and if so, to submit plans and estimates for such revised project.

Senate concurrent resolution 5.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 copies of Senate Document No. 77, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, "Les combattants Françaises de la Guerre Américane, 1778 to 1783," of which 500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 for the use of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, to be distributed under the direction of A. Howard Clark, registrar.

Senate concurrent resolution 1.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the concurrent resolution passed February 2, 1904, providing for the publication of the proceedings on the occasion of the unveiling of the Rochambeau statue is hereby continued in force and excepted from the limitation of one year, as provided in section 80 of the act of January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAMILTON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HIGGINS].

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Chairman, the principal argument of the gentlemen opposed to this bill is that there can be no union of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona because there is nothing in common between their people. They are located in about the same latitude and longitude. They both came into this country from the same nationality and in the same way. Their industries are the same, their development has come from the same sources, and they are both responsible to the same governing body—this Congress. In a country such as ours, whose national life and progress have been stimulated and maintained by the fusion of different blood and the union of many nationalities, it seems idle to say that a State should not be made out of these Territories because all of the people of these Territories are not of the same nationality. The very difference which by the opponents of this measure is claimed to exist will before a new Congress comes in be a source of strength to this new State. The very diversity of population, if there is a diversity, will prevent the abuse of corporate influences and secure to this section of our country a relief from a condition of government by special interests that the people have long wanted to be rid of.

It was said in the debate upon the floor yesterday that Oklahoma and Indian Territory, instead of being one State, would prefer to be two. I daresay that is true, and would like as well to be four. This same interest moves some Arizona people to ask to be left alone.

The assumption that Arizona ought not to be subjected to a State government against her will leads to the proposition that she is not to be admitted at any time to the Union without her consent. It reverses the order of things and subjects the forty-five sovereign States of the Union to submitting to the will of the people of Arizona what the States themselves have and ought to have the right to determine. It is not for this Congress to exploit a Territory. The eighty millions of people represented in this body are to determine the fitness for statehood rather than the 200,000 of any Territory. [Applause.] The basis of admission to statehood is not mere land, but the amount of population that this land can support. Territories are merely subdivisions for convenience and expediency. It is for Congress to make or unmake them, as in its judgment seems wise. There is no inherent right in the people of Arizona to come into the Union. As a Territory she is vested with no power to say how or when she shall be admitted.

A proposition was made to your committee by the minority that the question of the admission of Arizona and New Mexico be submitted to the people and not to become a law until approved by a majority of the electors of both Territories. I believe in the general principle of a referendum, and that the people can be trusted to act wisely, and that it is safe to leave questions to them. But what would be the result if jointure depended upon getting the votes of both Territories? If, as claimed by the opponents of this bill, that Arizona is opposed to joint statehood because she hopes for single statehood, how would her vote be cast? The population of Arizona is 123,000 and of New Mexico 195,000. If just one more than a half of the electors of Arizona, or 62,000 people, vote against this proposition, it governs the will of 256,000 people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee now occupy some of his time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, the plainest recommendation in the President's message is far the worst. He recommends the immediate admission of Arizona and New Mexico as one State, and makes this marvelous observation:

"There is no obligation on us to treat Territorial subdivisions—which are matters of convenience only—as binding us on the question of admission to statehood."

What remarkable language! Have the people no right to a word about their own institutions? Has Congress been at last advised by the President of the United States that too much time has been consumed by Congress in considering the great question of a State's admission into the Union and no more should be consumed, but the State must be made in a way that nobody ever asked for, and which is obnoxious to the best people of both Territories and absolutely calamitous to both in its far-reaching effects?

The President could not have known the conditions or he would not have made this recommendation. I infer from the very language of the message that he obtained his information from a consideration—to use his own words—"of all that has been developed in the discussions of the questions," and that must mean speeches made in the Senate when a filibuster—if I may properly use the term—was resorted to to prevent a vote on the bill giving these two Territories separate statehood. If the President believed any of the statements made in that debate I only wonder how he could recommend statehood for those Territories, either joint or single. The distinguished junior Senator from New York and an equally justly distinguished Senator from New Jersey threw great light on the subject in that marvelous "discussion of the question," the one on the educational qualifications of the blanket Indians and the other on the dangerous present effects of the Mountain Meadow massacre on our present western civilization.

But I am not inclined to severely censure or criticise the President. The mighty responsibilities which daily crowd on him, the great questions pressing hourly for solution, would not permit him to go as fully as is his habit into the actual facts which surround this subject and on the proper understanding of which so much of good or bad to my people depends. I regret that his informants were not informed. I regret that much of his information came through channels which he believed, but which were wholly prejudiced and unreliable. I acquit the President, as the whole world acquits him, of any intentional injustice. I know, and the world knows, that he hates injustice and oppression; that he loves a square deal. I know that he desires the prosperity and happiness of every part of this great country over which he wields for weal or woe so remarkable an influence. On account of that great influence I regret that the people on whom this blight will fall could not have seen the President personally and have given him the actual facts of the situation, and have thus obtained his potent aid in a matter of life or death to them.

I am sorry that this recommendation was made, for it is against every fiber of the President's nature to visit a wrong on the people, a wrong that can never be redressed, and which if carried out will not reach its apex until long after all of us shall have passed away and history shall have left its severest criticism of his marvelously active life upon this very recommendation. In its effect it stands so out of joint with all his writings and public utterances and so out of tune with his very nature that I know I am justified in my early assertion that the real facts were not at his hands when he wrote that part of his message. Let it be understood that whatever I shall say hereafter in this discussion which may seem a criticism is directed not at the President, but at those, and one in particular, who have been officiously and offensively active in misrepresenting the state of the case, not only to the President but to the country.

But the gentleman to whom I refer, and whose egotism is so inordinate that it will permit no pent-up Utica to contract its powers, and his native State being too small a world for his conquering spirit, has invaded Arizona and New Mexico and pretends to represent both against the will of each, and actually thinks he is the author of a joint statehood bill for these unhappy Territories—unhappy enough even before they knew him.

Long before he ever thought of the question Mr. LACEY, of Iowa, made a speech to that effect in this House, and Mr. OVERSTREET, of Indiana, moved an amendment (to the omnibus bill then pending, creating three States out of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma) making Arizona and New Mexico one State.

I acquit both those gentlemen of a serious intention to accomplish the ostensible purpose—their real intent being to defeat the omnibus bill. Their purpose was to defeat the bill, which was bad enough, not to accomplish this greater outrage, which would have been intolerable. So the one man most active in pressing this measure had nothing to do with originating it. It is with him another case of the "Onward march of Russia," which Napoleon prophesied a hundred years ago and lost his Empire in efforts to prevent. But I must not permit his gratuitous interference in our affairs to tempt me away from my purpose of convincing every fair-minded man in this House who will give me his attention of the grievous wrong and irreparable damage that the proposed statehood bill will do to both Arizona and New Mexico.

First of all, the Almighty divided them by an almost impassable mountain range, and placed His warning against this bill. There is not a hamlet of 500 people in Arizona, off the line of railroad, within 500 miles of the capital of the proposed State. There never will be. Two hundred miles of unsettled country lies between the two Territories along the great Continental Divide, and that vast area will remain forever practically unsettled and untenanted, except by the roving followers of flocks of sheep and herds of cattle, and these may never come on account of the scarcity of water and forage in that inhospitable desert mountain waste.

The waters of New Mexico flow into the Atlantic Ocean; those of Arizona into the Pacific. The people of Arizona trade with the Pacific coast, while New Mexico trades with the East. It is as far from any well-settled community in Arizona to the proposed capital of the new State as from Washington to Boston, which journey takes you through seven States.

In addition to the objection of an almost impassable boundary between these Territories, the very size of them is equally objectionable. A State of such dimensions can not be economically administered. Besides all this, we have different laws, different debts, different school systems, and a different language. Our hopes, aspirations, ideals are not harmonious. Arizona and New Mexico are as much strangers to each other as Maine is strange to Florida. The laws and customs of the latter are more homogenious than in the case of the Territories mentioned. There is so little in common between the two countries that nothing, save the almost intolerable condition of a Territorial form of government, would impel anybody in either Territory to listen with peaceful temper to a suggestion of such legislation as is here proposed.

When I landed in Arizona twenty-five years ago, without money and without friends, I never dreamed that I was working for New Mexico. There are 100,000 people in my Territory who came as I came, and who felt as I, that they were each factors in the upbuilding of a great Commonwealth, and all of whom freely gave of earnings to erect schoolhouses everywhere, churches, court-houses, asylums, normal schools, universities, penitentiaries, reform schools, and every machinery and enginery necessary to the proper and humane administration of a great State of the Federal Union. Do you think we ever dreamed that all these expenses, paid at so much cost of labor, yet gladly and with buoyant hope of the great future, that it must at last, and against our consent, be handed over to a neighbor who did not even speak our language, and to be used by him as best suited his cupidity, greed, or benevolence? The enormity of such a crime appalls me. There can be no excuse for it. No political exigency palliates it. Nothing can raise it from the calendar of crimes. As was said on this floor yesterday, such action by this House is simply a demurrer against the decalogue and a plea in bar against the Sermon on the Mount.

My countrymen, you can not afford to do this wrong. Congress is already unjustly in contempt for wrongs it has not perpetrated. It does and has perpetrated many, but I beseech you to stay your uplifted hand over the trembling flesh of the unoffending object of your sacrifice and save this House and this Congress from the crowning infamy of a century of legislation. [Applause.]

I trust you, my Republican friends, are too big and broad to permit political exigency to enter into your consideration of this question. There is nothing in that view. Do you see any cloud on the horizon that scares you? But if we did see danger to party success, can we afford to steal in order to prevent such disaster? Can we afford to oppress for all time a struggling people in order to allay a groundless fear? The man who prophesies what the political complexion of any new State will be five years hence is a fool, as crazy as any visionary prophet who ever saw the armies of Russia marching to the destruction of Japan.

I pity the man who would let political considerations dominate his action in a question so great as this. The Democratic party since my advent here admitted Washington and Montana and divided Dakota into two States, and every one went Republican. The same was true of Colorado, whose first electoral vote defeated Tilden for the Presidency. The Republican party admitted Idaho, Wyoming, and Utah. Two out of these three went Democratic, and all are now Republican. No man living can guess the politics of either Arizona or New Mexico should each be admitted as a State. It is idle to speculate. It is undignified, if not disgraceful, to speculate on conditions rooted in crime. There can be no compromise with wrong in a man's conscience, there should be none in this august body. I will not believe that my Republican friends will turn their people in my Territory over to the spoliation, exploitation, or benevolent assimilation of New Mexico. [Applause.]

The President says: "There is no obligation on us to treat Territorial subdivisions as binding us on the question of admission to statehood." That is a surprising statement when we contemplate the history of our legislation. Since the admission of Vermont and Kentucky, in 1791, up to this good hour there has not been a single Territory admitted as a State the boundary lines of which were not strictly preserved, except in cases where a less area was taken in, and that always on the consent of the Territory. Every line of our legislation regarding the territory of the United States has guaranteed, by promises as sacred as Congress could make, to each Territory when established full statehood when capable of sustaining a State government. But waiving all this, I plant myself on a promise made by Congress to Arizona when it was created. The President must not have seen the organic act which created Arizona, and which stands as our constitution in the Territory, just as a State constitution stands to the State. That organic act, that solemn Congressional promise, that guaranty on which we relied and still rely, says in so many words—I read from the act of February 24, 1863, and signed by Abraham Lincoln, which created the Territory of Arizona. It says: "That said government (Arizona) shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in said Territory shall * * * apply for and obtain admission as a State on an equal footing with the original States."

Can language be plainer? Under that promise we went forth to conquer the forbidding desert, we built our homes, we reared our schools, we made great expensive public improvements, and we find ourselves confronted by a bill which provides in effect for the admission of Arizona into the Union in conjunction with New Mexico, on such terms and under such conditions as the people of New Mexico may prescribe, and providing for the payment of the debts of New Mexico out of the taxable property in Arizona, and for other hellish purposes. That's exactly what this "Arizona the Great" bill means.

In the face of that promise who in my presence can vote for this infamous measure? Can you do it and look yourself in the face without a blush of shame?

I could well rest my appeal on that solemn promise before any justice of the peace in America and get judgment in our favor.

Relying on that guaranty, can I fail in a tribunal like this—the very tribunal which gave the promise?

Contemporaneous history shows a reason for that promise. The unhappy war between the States was at the crest of its sanguinary rage. Both parties were contending for possession of the then Territory of New Mexico. If I mistake not there was a Confederate and a Federal governor within its boundaries, one bearing the commission of Abraham Lincoln, the other of Jefferson Davis, both of whom first saw the light of this earth under the smiling skies of my native State. The Territory was found too large and passage over the present dividing line too difficult, and it was wisely decided to divide them into two Territories and by the act referred to Arizona was created. There was a large population of Spanish and Mexicans in New Mexico, who naturally retained the border prejudices growing out of our recent war with Mexico. Arizona was without any population of consequence. A premium must be offered to those who would dare invade and build homes in that then forbidding and desolate waste. That premium was offered in the organic act, in the promise which I have read to you and on which we relied, and on which our pioneers went forth with superhuman courage to overcome the superhuman difficulties which beset their path to progress. No band of devoted souls in the whole history of the human race bore more pain with greater fortitude, faced more danger without flinching, and accomplished more for their posterity and benefited their common country in a greater degree than did the Arizona pioneers. [Applause.]

And for all this what have they had at the hands of the Federal Government except oppression and injustice? And now it remains for you to burden and shame their declining days by throwing over them the dirty mantle now in your hands. They deserve better treatment. Ye who have been reared amid the luxuries of wealth and have from your birth been housed and clothed and comforted by pleasant surroundings can have small appreciation of the hardships endured by the State builders of America. You can not look into the bronzed face of the road maker across the wind-swept sands of the desert and read the pathetic story of the pains, hopes, disappointments, and dangers which crowded every day of his uncomplaining courageous life. And as he looked back on the work of his hands and saw a great State growing on the foundations which he laid, in his breast there grew a love of that land, a patriotism full of pride which you, sitting at the feet of money changers and measuring your patriotism by patronage, can never realize or half appreciate.

The virile, patriotic, militant Americanism of our earlier days has its dwelling place now in the hearts of the home builders of our western shore. When these reflections beset me, how I pity the stripling statesmen who have seen fit to denounce the representatives from the West as "sage-brush Senators" and have marked their first important legislative step by the crime of supporting this miserable measure. Shame on you younger men, who come here bloated with the high hope of giving valuable and free service to your country, but now find yourselves under party lash, compelled to do it irreparable injury. If compelled to do this wrong, decency should have dictated that you be silent about it.

Mr. Chairman, there is no justice or reason in joining these unwilling Territories in an inseparable and perpetual union. No reason has yet been assigned for it, and no reason for it can be advanced. If this be an effort to forever curb the West and keep it under eastern domination, why is there not one among you game and honest enough to say so? Are you afraid that such a declaration would drive away the western support which you now unhappily have in passing this bill?

You could with as much propriety join Alaska with Porto Rico. What is your purpose in this unholy scheme? Will some one dare answer? I can see how the selfishness of long-used power might blindly lead New England and extreme eastern Representatives to the support of any bill that would secure that power for all time. I can see how New England, less in area than Arizona alone, might willingly consent to keep twelve Senators in Congress and allow only twelve from the mouth of the Mississippi to the western border line of the English possessions. But why any man in the West would willingly permit a stretch of country over 3,500 miles in length by an average of some 400 miles wide to only equal New England in the Senate is impossible of explanation, unless, indeed, the time-serving statesman from that section wants a postmaster appointed at Bull Gulch or a public building erected in his little town, and, to secure his return to Congress by such statesmanship, is willing that his children's children may rise to curse him. To think of the great States of Texas, Arizona (as proposed), California, Washington, and Oregon fifty years from this day, with their teeming millions of people, being more than offset by New England alone in legislative power!

There are, thank God, many good people in New England opposed to the pending measure—broad, patriotic men, men legislating for the future, men who love liberty too well to impose shackles on us. The press of New England is opposed to this bill by reason of its injustice. I repeat, God bless them. I can't say in this presence what I feel like saying about our western neighbors who favor this iniquity. You leaders who are forcing the union of Arizona and New Mexico voted, every one of you, to divide Dakota. Every one of you have voted for single statehood for New Mexico, or at least did not vote against it when the bill was passed. You did the same in the case of Arizona in the Fifty-seventh Congress. Why this sudden change from good to bad? Was it at the mere ipse dixit of the President? Yet the President himself seems to have likewise changed, for in a letter written by him to Mr. Twitchell, of New Mexico, in the good year of our Lord 1900, and when he was the candidate for Vice-President on the ticket with the lamented McKinley the present President, among other things, said: "I only wish that New Mexico were to vote for President this fall. It is entitled to statehood, and I need not tell you, all that I can do to get it admitted as a State I will do."

Not one word about making it a part of Arizona. It was never dreamed of at that time. Not a soul in New Mexico then favored such a scheme. Yet the President confesses that five years ago New Mexico was entitled to statehood, and he promised to do his best to make it a State—a single State—not a double hydra-headed monster, as now recommended by him and stoutly resisted by the taxpaying people of both Territories. Oh, "it is glorious to have a giant's strength, but tyrannous to use it like a giant!"

I doubt the power of Congress to pass such a bill as this. What power Congress has is derived from the Constitution. Congress, it is true, has full power to create States out of Territories when the people residing therein consent. It can not make a State without the consent of the people. The Constitution prohibits the changing of the boundaries of any State without its consent. Is the organization of a Territory a mere idle ceremony? When it thus assumes the power of local self-government it assumes a constitutional and legal status which Congress has no right against its consent to molest. What is the legal status of a Territory occupying the position that Arizona occupies and has held for forty years? The Supreme Court of the United States has held that when a Territory was organized and the Constitution extended to it by Congress it is then clothed forever (and necessarily within its boundaries) with the inchoate right of ultimate statehood. Can Congress deprive Arizona of that constitutional right? As was said by Mr. MOON of Tennessee:

"Can Congress deprive a Territory of a constitutional right? If States can not be divided under the Constitution without their consent, or increased in area, can a Territory, once clothed by the extension of the Constitution with inchoate right of statehood, be denied that right without its consent? Is it not protected within its boundaries in its constitutional guaranties? Is not the right to statehood guaranteed when it possesses the qualifications for admission in the discretion of Congress? Congress may delay the exercise of this right—it can not destroy it. If so, the extension of constitutional rights to the Territories by the solemn act of Congress is a mockery."

The reasoning strikes me with force and is worthy of the careful consideration of this House, emanating as it does from one of the best lawyers in this body.

Mr. Chairman, I will not now consume the time of the House in setting forth the wonderful resources and rapidly developing industries of Arizona, which demonstrates the ability of that Territory to easily sustain every burden of statehood alone. That has been fully set forth in the minority report of the committee having this bill in charge, which report is at the hand of every Member, and to which I invite your careful attention. The same document shows equally the right of New Mexico to immediate single statehood.

Arizona and New Mexico are not homogeneous and never can be. They are strangers to each other and always will be. They have nothing in common and never can have. They differ in language, laws, customs, government, and ideals. They have different debts, which can never be equitably adjusted. Some counties in New Mexico are said to be bankrupt, while every public obligation in Arizona sells above par. Each Territory is fully equipped with the public buildings and utilities necessary to a full State government. New Mexico has many more people and much less property than Arizona. Under a legislature dominated by the greater vote of New Mexico, Arizona at once becomes subject to the will, caprice, or doubtful benevolence of the majority, no matter how good her population may be. Every man who has lived long in New Mexico speaks the Spanish language; a very few of Arizona's population can speak it at all. The Anglo-Saxon tongue, like the Angle-Saxon race, is by nature intolerant and aggressive. When thrown in too close contact with a different race and a different language it presses ruthlessly for domination.

It has taken thirty years of contact to bring about tolerance and harmony between the residents of New Mexico. That Territory is now fairly homogeneous. Add it to Arizona against the will of either and bitter race and religious prejudices will at once arise to curse the unholy alliance. Animosity and hate will usurp the place of justice and friendship, and our unhappy Territories, tied by a Gordian knot which neither can unloose or cut, must be retarded for ages in their onward march toward the supreme development which the God of nature designed for each. In their separation Arizona and New Mexico are happy and content enough. Unite them and the scene is changed as the brightest day is followed by the darkest night. Arizona protests against all this. She refuses to be dominated and controlled by the superior numbers in New Mexico. She knows that conflicts will come. Radical change of her entire governmental policy will ensue. Say what we may, and boast, if we please, of the humanities of modern civilization, but "Woe to the conquered" is as much a watchword to-day as when the Vandals rushed with dripping swords to the sack of Rome. It may not be bloody, but it can be equally as cruel. I beseech you, my countrymen, to avert this calamity. This may seem wild extravagance of speech to you, but the facts, to my mind, are as clear as the noonday sun.

Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say against the people of New Mexico. If let alone for a season they will, I doubt not, work out a satisfactory destiny. For those in that Territory who are pressing, by their influence and against our will, this union of the two I can not repress the expression of my contempt. Men who would thus wrong their neighbors are unworthy to hold for one minute the reins of State government. We have a just fear of placing power in such hands.

Who is responsible for this bill, anyway? Where did it come from? Arizona did not ask it, and her Delegate here is certainly as well acquainted with her wishes and her interests as is the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], or any other Member of either House of Congress. New Mexico did not ask it. Her Delegate here was elected on a single-statehood platform. Who commissioned any Senator to represent either of these people. And that reminds me; the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], in a report made by him to the Senate, which is a public document though hard to find, said this of New Mexico. Mind you, I am not sanctioning the report nor giving it my indorsement:

[Senate Report No. 2206, part 1, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session.]

ANALYSIS OF NEW MEXICAN POPULATION.

The greater majority are native New Mexicans of Spanish and mixed Spanish and Indian descent, and these practically all speak Spanish in the affairs of daily life, and the majority speak nothing but Spanish.

COURTS CONDUCTED THROUGH INTERPRETERS.

Courts are conducted through the medium of an interpreter, and it is impossible to conduct the machinery of justice without this official. (Testimony of Judge W. J. Mills, p. 2; Nepomuceno Segura, p. 4; William A. Gortner, p. 6; Judge McFie, p. 29; Judge Baker, p. 46; Judge McMillan, p. 110; Judge Parker, p. 96; Jose D. Sena, p. 31, and others.)

The interpreter interprets the testimony of witnesses to the jury, the argument of counsel to the jury, and the charge of the court to the jury. (Testimony of witnesses above.)

Occasionally the interpreter must be sent by the judge to the jury room in order to enable the jury to reach a verdict, since it sometimes happens that some of the members of the jury are English speaking, some Spanish speaking, and no member of the jury can speak both languages. (Testimony of Nepomuceno Segura, p. 7; Judge McFie, p. 50; Judge Parker, p. 265; Judge McMillan, p. 293; Jose D. Sena, p. 59; Nestor Montoya, p. 90.)

In the majority of cases it is true that some member of the jury is able to speak both languages and can then act as interpreter for the others. (Testimony of witnesses above.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE SPANISH.

Coming to the "courts of the people"—justices of the peace—practically all of them speak Spanish and the proceedings of their courts are conducted in Spanish. The dockets of nearly all justices of the peace are kept almost exclusively in Spanish. The statutes of the Territory in the offices of practically all justices of the peace are printed in Spanish. (Testimony of Jesus Maria Tefoya, p. 12; Felipe Baca y Garcia, p. 26; Francisco Anaya, p. 39; Charles M. Conklin, p. 40; Jose Maria Garcia, p. 41; Juvenico Quintana, p. 42; Leonardo Duran, p. 43; Seferino Crollott, p. 52; Manuel Lopez, p. 98.)

POLITICAL CONVENTIONS AND SPEECHES BY INTERPRETERS.

In political campaigns almost all political speeches are made either in Spanish or in English through an interpreter, and interpreters are used in practically all (it may even be said in all) political conventions. (Testimony of C. M. Foraker, p. 74; H. S. Wooster, p. 18; Felipe Bacay Garcia, p. 26, and others.)

This is true even in the "American" town of Albuquerque. (Testimony of C. M. Foraker, p. 74.)

An interpreter was used in the last Republican Territorial convenvention, which nominated the present Delegate to Congress, and nominating speeches were made through that medium. (Testimony of Jose D. Sena, p. 32.)

An interpreter is used in the legislature, and both councils (senate and house) have official interpreters. (Testimony of Jose D. Sena, pp. 32–33.)

SPANISH AND ENGLISH TAUGHT IN SCHOOLS.

Until recently (historically speaking) no English was taught in the common schools. At present both Spanish and English are taught in most of the schools. (Testimony of Miss Francesca Zana, p. 9; Enrique Armijo, p. 10; J. Francisco Chavez, p. 27; Rafael Gallegos, p. 22, and others.)

Spanish is taught through the second reader and no further, because a person who has learned Spanish sufficiently to go through Manelia's Second Spanish Reader can speak and write that language fluently, and no further instruction for practical purposes is necessary. (Testimony of Enrique Armijo, p. 16.)

In some schools, as in those at Santa Fe, no Spanish is taught. (Testimony of J. Francisco Chavez, pp. 27–28.)

IN SOME SCHOOLS SPANISH IS TAUGHT EXCLUSIVELY.

In some schools Spanish is taught exclusively, and history, arithmetic, and geography are translated from American text into Spanish. (Testimony of J. Francisco Chavez, superintendent public instruction for New Mexico, pp. 27–28.)

In the elections it is necessary to print ballots in Spanish as well as in English. (Testimony of H. S. Wooster, p. 18; Pablo Ulibarri, p. 14; Martinez, Amador, p. 105.)

There are towns (some even when surrounded by heavily predominating American conditions and influences, such as at Las Vegas) where the signs at grocery stores, meat markets, and all the mercantile establishments are printed exclusively in Spanish. (Testimony of Enrique E. Salasar, p. 11.)

The above are the conditions even in the larger towns; and this is intensified, of course, in the little country settlements, where the people are usually bunched together, their occupation being principally that of herding sheep and goats and with little or practically no communication with the outer world. (Testimony of H. S. Wooster, pp. 18–19; Rafael Gallegos, p. 22, and others.)

A portion of the population, even including some justices of the peace, have little understanding of our institutions. (Testimony of Felipe Baca y Garcia, p. 25; Leonardo Duran, p. 43.)

ILLITERACY.

The remainder of the 195,310 people in New Mexico are called in that Territory "Americans," as contradistinguished from the class above spoken of, who are there termed "Mexicans." But the "Americans" are made up from every other nationality except Mexicans. Germans, Italians, French, and all other nationalities are called "Americans." And yet of the entire population of New Mexico 33.2 per cent are illiterates—that is, that portion can neither read nor write Spanish, English, or any other language. (Census of 1900.)

If the test of illiteracy were confined to the English language only, the committee is of opinion that the percentage of illiterates would be much more than doubled.

After giving Arizona a slightly less drastic dose, the report (Senate No. 2206, part 1, 57th Cong.) concludes as follows:

The committee feel that it is wiser and better for the Territories themselves, and for the nation, that they shall wait that development which the resources claimed by their advocates will justify. When that occurs, when all of the requisites for statehood shall have been supplied, the members of the committee who are against the present admission of these Territories in their present state will be as enthusiastic and earnest for their admission as their most ardent advocates.

"Consistency, thou art a jewel." This same Senator at the present session of this Congress has reported favorably a bill to unite these two Territories into one State. He proceeds, from his own argument, on the principle that one rotten egg is bad, but two rotten ones would make a fine omelet. I am not complaining of the Spanish tongue or the people of New Mexico who speak no other. A man can speak Spanish only and be just as good a citizen as you or I, my contention in this regard being that if I can not speak a word of Spanish and my partner can not speak a word of English, the business would not prosper, and dissolution would be the wisest step for such a partnership to take. We have in Arizona Mexicans, or persons of Mexican descent, of wealth, education, culture, and high standing, who would honor the citizenship of any country. A great majority of those permanently domiciled in Arizona speak English as well as you or I; their children attend the public schools with ours; they bear every burden imposed by government as willingly as we; yet I am assured that this element of our citizenship is as much opposed to this proposed union as is the balance of our population. In fact, opposition to this bill is a duty of patriotism. It is a test of State pride. If a man love not his own State, I would not give a fig for all the patriotism his little heart could hold. You can not, as I said before, fully appreciate the love the builders bear to Arizona. Few of my hearers had a hand in making the State in which they were born. It is different with us. Our love for ours is not a mere inert theory, but a living, pulsing passion. "The earth is His for He made it" is the language of Holy Writ.

It is true that for many years the bird of prey has been hovering about us, but I can find no refuge under the shield of New Mexico. It is flying from the evils of which we have plenty to a promised shelter where we will find more. No; it is not a case of our free will. We are being forced, coerced, by this bill to dance to any tune which New Mexican pipers may play. This is an anomaly in the history of statehood. On the admission of the last State Congress makes its first departure. Who before this hour ever heard of a Territory being forced into the Union against its will, either single or otherwise? The gentleman who just took his seat laid down the new doctrine that Congress had power to throw a Territory into the Union nolens volens. I would like to know when it has been done.

Mr. MANN. It has been done frequently. It has been done more than once.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Do you say that any Territory has ever been forced into the Union without the expressed consent of the people residing therein?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. When did that remarkable case occur? Name it.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman desire to exhaust his time in that way?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; I want that remarkable information.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman heard the gentleman from Ohio state that about Ohio yesterday.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I don't care what the gentleman from Ohio states in that regard. We know with what recklessness history is forgotten. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may not care about what anybody says.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I only asked information when interrupted. If the gentleman can't give it, let the incident close.

Mr. MANN. I can give the gentleman information.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Not on this subject. It is enough for me to say that it never occurred in our history, and will disgrace our history when it does occur.

When I contemplate the means which have been resorted to in order to pass this bill, I tremble for the liberties of the people. A precedent like this in a just cause would be indefensible; in a bad cause it is monstrous. What are we coming to? Whither are we tending? Must we now unlearn all we have studied and revered in our form of government? Are its three great branches—the legislative, executive, and judicial—to be blended? My idea of the President's proper function toward legislation was to recommend to Congress measures which meet his approval and leave to Congress the wisdom of following or refusing to follow his suggestions.

The House of Representatives now being dominated by the Speaker, and the individual Member sunk into utter insignificance, the agreements and trades entered into by the Speaker and the President as to what laws shall pass and what shall not, furnishes to the thoughtful mind a spectacle which should call its every faculty to resentment. The prestige of the Speaker with the patronage of the President can accomplish too much in the House of Representatives. It did accomplish too much in passing the unfair rule under the operation of which this bill will pass.

We have quickly grown familiar here with the exploitation of other lands and other people. I am reminded of what I said when the Philippine Islands first fell into our hands, but my prophecy is being fulfilled much earlier than I expected and feared. In that discussion I said here, that whenever we began to govern any people anywhere under our flag by force of arms, that when the citizens' rights were to be exercised under the flashing light of the sword, we would soon forget the rights of our people at home, and look unmoved on oppressions then which would now stir our country to its foundation.

After ruling colonies for three short years by mere military force, I am shocked to see you sitting smiling and careless here when every right of our people at home is being trampled under foot of a partisan majority. Becoming used to acts like this, how long before the President and Congress will invade the sacred rights of a State and direct under force its internal affairs. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The extreme means resorted to to pass this bill is utterly indefensible under our form of government. I shall take occasion at some future time to tell the history of it on this floor and let the country see what strides we are making toward the utter overthrow of constitutional liberty in this blessed land of ours. While we of Arizona have been falsely accused of bribery and corruption in efforts to defeat this bill, the people of Arizona and New Mexico are handed out five million cash as a bribe to adopt a constitution under it. Arizona never asked for it. She stands no mendicant at your doors. Pay her what you have taken from her through fraudulent railroad bonds, made valid by act of Congress. Pay back to her what your protected wards—the Apache—have robbed them of under your very eyes, and leave her in peace for a time and she will amply care for herself. Be just to her before you take other people's money in efforts to bribe her to acts inimical to her every interest.

My health admonishes me that I must bring these remarks to a close, but I can not do so without expressing the hope that the President will withdraw his great influence from this bill, and aid in passing this bitter cup from the lips of our people, from whom he enlisted the first company in his regiment for service in the war with Spain, and on the courage of which much of his great reputation was reared. The dauntless heart of Capt. "Buckie" O'Neil poured out its life's libation on the soil of Cuba while serving under Colonel Roosevelt in the glorious effort to free an alien people from the yoke of Spain. Thus Arizona furnished as a sacrifice to the liberties of others one of her most gallant sons, a man whose presence now we so much need to implead his late colonel to save his own people from the imposition of a yoke too grievous to bear. He aided in saving others, his own he can not save, for that tuneful tongue is silent; that facile pen is still. Does his pathetic death, met in the full glory of useful life, make no appeal to you? How gladly would Captain O'Neil have laid down that life to shield Arizona from this alliance. He willingly surrendered it in a less appealing cause. Of such as him is made the mettle of our western pastures—men who would seek no substitute in time of war, would hesitate at no hardship their country's defense might impose. If, indeed, the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church, we may hope from such sacrifices as these Arizona's appeal will be heard and strengthened. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, Arizona is ours. It belongs to her people. We belong to a race that has never yet divided sovereignty and dominion—the very Joshua of mankind, of whom it was written that "Upon whatever soil he sets his foot, it shall be his, and no man shall stand against him all the days of his life." Arizona is ours by the blood of our kinsmen and neighbors, by the ashes of our dead, and, please God, it shall be transmitted unshorn of its blessings to our descendants forever. As I contemplate what this House is about to do I am overwhelmed with fears for the future of my country. A casual glance at history will trace too close a parallel between us and those proud republics whose wreckage dots the shores of time. It is still a problem if men can remain free. A reckless and brutal majority can easily become a many-headed tyrant. When patronage and advancement of political interest can dethrone the right in this House now, what will it be able to accomplish fifty years hence? What is this patronage of which we hear and see so much in the public press and on this floor? What is it but vulgar graft, invading the realm of statesmanship and intruding its coarse and sordid face in the temple of the people's rights? If such graft is to be the aim and standard of public service, it is time for an awakened public opinion to shake like a tempest the pestilential pool in which the virtues are stagnating and restore the waters and the atmosphere to their ancient purity.

We are holding colonies under the sword while Old Glory, the emblem of the free, floats above the glistening arms of the soldiery. We have spent already about $800,000,000 on and about the Philippines and have derived less in revenues than would build one battle ship to protect those worthless islands that lie rotting in the sun. We are seeing treaties executed, in effect, without the concurrence of the Senate, treaties which the Senate had refused to ratify. We see our gunboats bristling in harbors of a sister republic and our American officers there collecting customs to pay disputed and unsettled claims set up by the countries of Europe. This may seem all right to many, but to me it seems all wrong. The conservatism of the country so needed in this hour is to be found in the West. That country should not be erected into States larger than the mighty empires of the Old World. That savoring will be needed in the fast approaching days.

Mr. Chairman, let me beseech this House to assume and preserve its ancient dignity free from all encroachments, either of its own Speaker or any department of Government. The safety of the country lies within these plain boundary lines. We can not be too watchful. The free, untrammeled voice and vote of our Representatives in Congress is the first essential of a free republic and the only guaranty of its safety and happiness. When we shall all have passed into silence our posterity will be struggling with the problems of government which we bequeath to them. Let us highly resolve that we will transmit to our sons the blessings of liberty as full and free and pure as we received them from our fathers. As was well said in a recent speech of the eloquent Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]: "There are visible signs of an approaching Titanic struggle. Upon the one hand are the forces of greed and avarice, blown with pride and insolent with power; on the other the spirit of a vague but vast unrest, the spirit of revolution striking with blind fury at existing conditions—a spirit which would substitute anarchy for tyranny and chaos for corruption. Woe be to him who can see no peril in this ominous activity of the spirit of unrest; woe to him who mocks at the blind Samson when he strains at the pillars of the temple."

There is likewise in the land a spirit of false commercialism, which holds every man in derision who will not, for present profit, sacrifice the truest principles of his Government. Of such are those who to-day are mortgaging Arizona's future for a present mess of poor pottage. We must not destroy reverence for the old faiths, for nothing then will be left to which you can appeal against the passions of the hour. " It is a perilous thing to shake the foundations of a nation's faith." Let me say to you who would exalt the sordid motive of patronage above devotion to principle that you are marked for obscurity when the day of purification comes.

My countrymen, if by continued acts of violence to the people's will, if by the continued suppression of their voice in legislation, if by sealing the lips of their only mouthpiece on this floor, so that no voice of theirs can invade this Chamber; if by such acts of injustice and tyranny you unchain the spirit of revolution, do not dream that you can direct its course of destruction or that it will spare some corner of the Constitution where you may find shelter.

If we would perpetuate this Republic we must preserve those high purposes which gave it life and are the very breath of its nostrils. If we would resist the forces of disorder we must preserve intact the walls our fathers reared as limitations around the three great powers of government, and stand fast by the citadel of the Constitution as by the ark of the covenant of the living God. [Continued applause.]

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, during the few brief moments allotted to me I shall address myself to that portion of this bill which relates to Oklahoma and the Indian Territory.

There was a portion of what is now Oklahoma opened to settlement September 16, 1889. This is what is ordinarily, in that country, known as "Original Oklahoma," and the first territory now comprised within the bounds of Oklahoma that was opened for settlement to the white man. Previous to that date, with the exception of a few scattering bands of Indians, Oklahoma was an uninhabited country. This first opening brought to Oklahoma about 100,000 people, and on June 6, 1890, Oklahoma was, by act of Congress, created a Territory and given a Territorial form of government. Other territory has been added, including the Wichita, Sac and Fox, Cheyenne and Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache reservations, and the great Cherokee Strip, until to-day we have an area of 24,000,000 acres, a little larger than the State of Indiana and a little less than the State of Ohio, populated with nearly 1,000,000 of bright, thrifty, energetic, and intelligent people from every part of the American continent. Our representation in Congress by the provisions of this bill was based largely upon the census of 1900, which gave to Oklahoma and the Indian Territory combined a population of less than 800,000 people. This would be but a fair representation for the Territory of Oklahoma to-day aside from that magnificent population of energy and thrift which inhabits the Indian Territory. The growth and advancement of Oklahoma Territory for the last sixteen years has never had a parallel, and the people of a large portion of the United States have little conception of the great diversified natural resources of that country.

The Indian Territory under its present boundaries embraces the reservations commonly known throughout the Territory as the Five Civilized Tribes—the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminoles—and the small reservation embraced in the Quapaw Reservation, in the northeast corner of the Territory. Indian Territory at one time included within its bounds all of the present Territory of Oklahoma except the counties of Greer and Beaver, and was by the General Government designated as the home of the American Indian. The development of the Indian Territory has not been so rapid as that of Oklahoma, for the reason that conditions were not such as to invite the white man to that Territory. The delay by the Government of the United States in breaking up tribal relations in that Territory and our policy toward the Five Civilized Tribes has largely impeded progress there. The Indian until recently could not alienate his land, and the present provisions of alienation are so limited that few persons up to this date have been able to own their land in fee simple. And it is because of this policy, which has retarded progress and civilization among the Five Civilized Tribes, that has led Oklahoma in the past to make an effort for statehood for that Territory regardless of the Indian Territory. There seems to be no difference in sentiment upon the part of the various Members of this Congress, so far as I have been advised, as to our qualifications for statehood. There has been a difference, however, as to the kind and character of statehood that we should have. But I believe that question is now settled and the people of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory are practically unanimous in their efforts to secure the passage of this bill, uniting the two Territories into one State; and to this sentiment there is very little opposition.

There has, Mr. Chairman, been urged against this statehood bill, as a reason why it should not become a law, that the people of Oklahoma and the people of Indian Territory desire another kind of statehood. There has been something said about the State of Sequoyah, and an election recently held for the purpose of adopting a constitution for the proposed State of Sequoyah, including the Indian Territory and nothing more. The real purpose of the convention which resulted in this movement and the effort for the State of Sequoyah, in my judgment, was not altogether sincere. There is a strong element in the Indian Territory, and a most dangerous element, too, to civilized tendencies, so far as the Indian is concerned, which is most strenuously opposed to any kind of statehood, whether it be single or double, whether it be statehood for Oklahoma or the Indian Territory. Sometimes the tactics pursued by these people are one thing and sometimes another. First, they contend that the Indian of the Indian Territory is not prepared for statehood; not sufficiently civilized to cope in business and other matters with his white neighbor. Other times they call a convention and inaugurate the Sequoyah movement, or some other movement, the real purpose of which it not to assist the Indian Territory to statehood, but to throw every possible obstruction and impediment in the way of statehood of any kind or character. The real purpose of these gentlemen in that Territory is not to civilize the Indian. But statehood means representation on this floor from the Indian Territory; it means honest, capable, and legitimate representation, which would foil many plans which have heretofore been fostered in that country for the purpose of individual and material gain.

If we propose to civilize the Indian, if it is the policy and purpose of the American Government to better his condition, the quickest method, the safest and surest plan to success would be immediate statehood for those people. The Indian by nature is averse to the habits of the white man. Everything that the white man has and everything he does is not looked upon by the Indian with favor, and unless the habits of the white man are forced upon him he will never accept them. They do not accept our Christianity readily and they do not accept our business methods readily, but the most civilized Indian of to-day is the one who has been thrown with white men, white society, and surrounded by civilized people where the methods of the whites predominated and prevailed as against the method of the Indian. If you would civilize the Indian you must give him a white citizen for a neighbor. If you would have him adopt the custom of the white man you should put the custom, habits, and tendencies of the white man within his reach. We have many object lessons of this kind in the two Territories. The Indian most civilized to-day in Oklahoma is the Indian who has been most with the white man. The Indian least civilized to-day in that country is the one who has been the shortest length of time with the white man. There are two or three tribes in that country that wear the blanket to this day—the Osage Indians and the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians. The reason these tribes wear the blanket is because they more than any other Indians of my country have been isolated from the white race and its influences for good.

I have in mind some individual cases of young men of Indian blood who were taken by certain churches and grew to manhood in communities where they scarcely saw an Indian, and in each of those cases they are self-sustaining and resent any proffered assistance from the General Government. They were reared, cultured, and educated where they had not the example and knew little of the tradition and history of their own race. In their habits and customs they were essentially white people. In everything but name they are genuinely our kind.

And so, Mr. Chairman, for the sake of emphasis I repeat that the Indian Territory is not only prepared at this time for statehood, but if it had been given statehood a quarter of a century ago it would have been better for the Indian and better for every refining tendency and influence of that country. If Oklahoma and Indian Territory could have been given statehood as one State on the very first day of the opening of Oklahoma in 1889 that country at this time would have been one of the very leading States of this Union, with a population of 3,000,000 people. There is no question about the necessity of statehood in that country. There is no question as to the benign influences of such legislation. There is not one single citizen, either white, black, or red, in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory to whom statehood would bring a hardship. But, on the contrary, every person who stands for the higher order of civilization, every person who believes in promoting and advancing the Indian to a higher plane and better citizenship would indorse this act and this bill, or any other bill, or any other act, which would bring immediate statehood to these people.

But not only the Indian is to be considered. There are perhaps not to exceed 100,000 persons of Indian blood in that country. In addition to this number there are seventeen or eighteen hundred thousand white people, coming from every State of the Union, who have reason from the natural course of things to expect that they would have statehood and all its advantages even before this date. There was, according to the last report of the governor of Oklahoma, June 30, 1905, about 800,000 people in Oklahoma. There are perhaps as many or nearly as many in the Indian Territory. There are to-day at least sixteen or seventeen hundred thousand people in those Territories. They have come from every part of the United States and represent the highest possibilities of American citizenship; and there are no more patriotic, liberty-loving, energetic people in the American Republic than are found there. They are not only capable of self-government, but they are capable of the highest type of government. There is no State in the Union with an equal population which has greater advantages, and there is no State in the Union with an equal population that has more schools than has the Territory of Oklahoma. In the Indian Territory it is different, for the reason that there is no provision for school district organization. We feel that in our efforts and concessions for statehood we have done our duty. We are confident that we have done everything that could be done so far as the people of those two Territories are concerned to acquiesce in the desire of the General Government as to the kind of statehood we should have. This Congress is legislating not only for the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, but for 80,000,000 people.

There was a time when those of Oklahoma believed they were entitled to statehood without Indian Territory. There was also a time when the people of Indian Territory believed themselves entitled to statehood without Oklahoma; but both Territories are convinced that it is the natural tendency of the American Congress to give them ultimately one State, and whatever might have been their personal contentions and desires they have abandoned everything to the will of the majority of the people of this great Republic. Those who believed that Oklahoma should be a State alone have reconciled themselves to their fate and fallen in line and are in sympathy with this bill, because it is believed to be the most practical and probably the better statesmanship. The same is true largely of those in the Indian Territory, though they may believe that country entitled to be a State of itself. Everything has been abandoned with the hope that the American Congress will adopt the policy which has been outlined by the majority of this Congress and outlined by a majority of the last Congress as well as that of the President of the United States and the Administration in general.

Under the provisions of this bill, Mr. Chairman, we would not be a State until March 4, 1907. As I have previously stated, the last governor's report of Oklahoma indicated a population in that Territory of about 800,000 people. This report ended the fiscal year of June 30, 1905. Since that date the enormous growth which has been going on in these Territories for a number of years has continued. Our cities are building rapidly, and the rural districts are receiving their due share of this great influx of population. Judging from the growth of the past three or four years, it is but fair to say that before we become a State under the provisions of this bill Oklahoma and Indian Territory as one State will have at least 2,000,000 people and entitled upon this floor to a representation of 10 Members. This is a remarkable condition of affairs. American history has never checked upon its pages an improvement so rapid and a growth in population so enormous. And I sincerely hope that inasmuch as every Member of this House practically has expressed a sentiment that we should be a State, we should not allow any differences as to the manner of becoming a State to interfere with our admission to the Union. Two millions of people, educated and Christian, with innumerable schools and churches, happy, prosperous, and contented, as abundantly capable of self-government as any part of this great country should not be made to suffer because of the individual differences of opinion as to how statehood should come.

I have been interrogated a great many times and by a great many people upon this floor as to the kind of people that inhabit that country. And in answer to these inquiries I desire to state that there is scarcely a Member upon this floor but who has friends and former constituents in that country. However, the shortcomings of my people are ofttimes magnified. I have been somewhat impatient with those on dress parade who have advertised that as being one of the only places left where could be found the high-heeled boot, the 6-shooter, the lariat, and bucking broncho. There are no people with more refined tendencies; no place where schools are so numerous, and no place where all these things which contribute to the well-being of our race are more apparent than in those two Territories. The only people who have come without our sanction are a few cases where the ability of certain individuals was not appreciated at home and they were commissioned to that Territory with a good salary. But they are tolerable, and in proof of the statement I would suggest that almost invariably when they came they were armed with hundreds of letters and testimonials of character, containing statements of the superior ability they exhibited in the States from which they came, but it was found necessary that they migrate because of the state of their health, and that they had friends and relatives at home of great influence—and the latter statement we were always inclined to believe. But the people of that Territory have done a great missionary work, and in almost every instance such as I have just mentioned those people have become fairly good citizens and in many instances will be recognized at home, if you will only give us a State.

In June, 1905, the Press Association of America had its meeting in Oklahoma. At that time I am advised that there were represented at that association several thousand of the leading newspapers of the country. I took occasion to ascertain what was said by those various representatives of the press upon their return home, and I have yet to discover a single instance where those gentlemen failed to present our cause to the American people. One of the leading papers of the country stated in substance that they "were positively stunned at the enormous growth of that Territory; that it would be a crime for the American Congress to refuse to give us statehood at the first session, and that no State in the history of the country had ever made its case so strong as have Oklahoma and Indian Territory." In point of merit we stand alone, and the only thing we are asking at the hands of the American Congress is to allow us to pass to statehood unhampered by the demands of any other section of the country. We feel that this is a government of merit, and that the reason we are the greatest Government among the civilized nations of to-day is because we are a government of merit; and as American citizens we believe that every tub should stand upon its own bottom, and that we no longer should be required to furnish the steam to propel anybody else's vehicle.

In order that this House may have some understanding of our population, I desire to submit the vote of Oklahoma in connection with some other States at the last Presidential election. I am advised that the Republican poll of the voting population of Oklahoma, as well as the Democratic poll, at the last election showed that there were about 137,000 voters in Oklahoma, and at that election, outside of county officers, there was no one for whom a vote could be cast other than a Delegate. There was not the incentive to draw the people to the polls that there was in the States, where the Presidential campaign was on; and at that election Oklahoma cast 110,000 votes, and the following States cast a less number:

Alabama	108,845
Delaware	42,873
Florida	39,302
Idaho	72,578
Louisiana	53,908
Maine	96,027
Mississippi	58,383
Montana	64,444
Nevada	36,154
New Hampshire	90,089
North Dakota	70,175
Oregon	90,184
Rhode Island	68,856
South Carolina	56,912
South Dakota	101,995
Utah	101,624
Vermont	51,885
Wyoming	30,655

It will be observed that eighteen States cast a less number of votes than Oklahoma alone. Adding the vote of the Indian Territory to the vote of Oklahoma at that election would have easily reached the figure of 250,000 legal voters. The additional States of the Union which cast a less number of votes than 250,000 are:

Arkansas	116,411
Connecticut	191,116
Georgia	138,198
North Carolina	207,867
Virginia	130,540
Washington	128,713
Nebraska	224,708

There are a few others, which I do not recall at this time; but there were thirty-two States which cast less than 250,000 votes and less than would have been the combined vote of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory at that time, and very much less than would be their combined vote of to-day.

Oklahoma exported in the last year 13,920 carloads of wheat, 8,023 carloads of flour, 2,368 carloads of feed stuff, 4,587 carloads of grain, 3,204 carloads of cattle, and 422,092 bales of cotton.

Conceding that the exports of the Indian Territory were as heavy as those of Oklahoma, to move them would require a train reaching from Washington to New York, New York to Chicago, Chicago to St. Louis, and from St. Louis to Washington.

Oklahoma has 345 newspapers, of which there are 30 dailies, 287 weeklies, 5 semimonthlies, 19 monthlies, and 4 quarterlies. The Indian Territory has 142 newspapers, of which there are 19 dailies, 117 weeklies, and 2 semimonthlies, the total number of newspapers published in the two Territories being 487.

There are in Oklahoma 257 Territorial banks and 95 national banks; in the Indian Territory, 144 individual banks and 118 national banks—more than has the great State of Missouri, and more, in fact, than has nine-tenths of the States of the Union.

Out of 86,908 families in 1900, 60,086 owned their own homes, 50,483 of these being without mortgages or incumbrances of any kind. The percentage of families owning their own homes is greater than any State in the Union except three, and the percentage of homes free from debt is greater than any State in the Union.

Thirty-one States have a greater amount of illiteracy than Oklahoma. The percentage of illiteracy among the males of voting age is 5.9, exactly the same as the State of New York. It is less than Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, or the District of Columbia.

Manufacturing is only beginning to develop. In 1905, 637 factories had capital employed $11,074,267, and an output of $16,433,430, and 3,492 wage-earners.

Oil fields are rich, one field alone producing 11,000 barrels per day and 50,000,000 feet of gas per day.

Shawnee, Okla., is the largest potato-shipping point in the United States, 500 cars last season bringing in $100,000 clear profit.

The two Territories have 6,000 miles of railroad, and within the last six years one-third of the railroads built in the United States was in those Territories. The railroad trackage of to-day would reach twice across the American continent between New York and San Francisco.

In behalf of 2,000,000 people I earnestly advocate the passage of this bill. No person upon this floor at any time or under any circumstance has urged a single reason why we should not be admitted, and I hope that the complications which have heretofore arisen and prevented our admission will not be permitted to interfere longer to prevent statehood for that country. Our people are essentially American, as much so as is found in any other part of the country. The spirit of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution of the United States is manifest in every community. The love of religious liberty and universal freedom is as dear to those people as they were to the Puritan at Plymouth Rock and our forefathers at Jamestown. There is no sentiment that has contributed to the building of this nation that does not dwell there, and we are here pleading that the great Government of the United States, through the American Congress, may relieve us from the restraint, unnatural and un-American, and lift us to the plane of the States of the American Union.

I hope this bill will pass. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, it is not very easy to crowd a two hours' speech into ten minutes. The gentlemen who are responsible for the rule under which we are acting have not been liberal in the amount of time they have granted us. I wish to commend them for their procedure in the debate upon the Philippine bill, when Members of this House, of both parties, for a week discussed a question of great public interest to the edification of each other to some extent and for the information of the people of the United States upon a great national question. They have taken this question of statehood, which is vital—in a sense involves the principles of representative government, involves the welfare of the people of a great Territory—upon which there is a marked division in this Chamber, and they have allowed us only time enough to simply touch the question.

They went into a Republican conference, and they have brought in the subject of that conference into this debate themselves, and I am therefore warranted in alluding to it. They proposed first to hold a caucus; decided not to do it. Why? Because many Republicans went to them and said that they would not go into a caucus and be bound by its action. When that conference met the question was put to its chairman by myself as to whether or not that was a conference or a caucus, and the reply came back that it was a conference. What is a conference? It is a place where members of a party meet and reason together and see if they can not convince each other that each is right. It is not a place where men are bound; and the Republican managers of this House know just as well as I know that they declined to call a caucus because Republicans declared to them they would not be bound by the action of any such caucus. When they went into conference what happened? Gentlemen on the other side of this question took an hour and a half, and they granted us who opposed them only ten minutes. Is that good Republican politics? Will the leaders of this House lecture us about Republican policies and adopt a policy like that? Is that representative government? Is it loyalty to the history and traditions and policies and legislation of the Republican party? And then bring in an ironclad rule, binding these two propositions together, so that we will be compelled to vote upon them with one vote, and then come into this House and permit us but one-tenth or one-twentieth of the time we ought to have.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I listened yesterday to the speech of the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Territories. I do not wonder that that gentleman devoted considerable time to rhetorical climaxes, that he talked about "the glistening sands of the desert" and "towering mountain peaks" and "eternal sunshine," because it is far better for him to discuss those things than to discuss the real merits of the question. When he came down to make what he calls an argument, what did he say? Let me give you a sample. He said that the corporations in New Mexico were against joint statehood because they did not want to be taxed, and he said that there were some railroads in Arizona that were exempt from taxation. Why did not the gentleman tell the whole truth about that question? Why did not the chairman of the Committee on Territories say to this House that the people of Arizona came to the Congress of the United States, in 1890 I think it was, and asked Congress to pass an enabling act so that bonds might be voted by the county of Maricopa to build a railroad through desolate regions to develop undeveloped resources in the interest of the people of that Territory? And why did he not say, in addition to that, such a bill was passed, and it was vetoed by President Harrison, that thereupon the Territorial legislature of Arizona exempted these roads from taxation in order to get capital in there to build roads that were needed and that probably would not pay for years to come?

Mr. HAMILTON. How many miles of road were there?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I do not know; 138 in one line, I think.

Mr. HAMILTON. Why, there are a thousand miles of exempt railroad in New Mexico and 586 in Arizona.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. And I want to say further to the gentleman that that proceeding has met the approval of the people of Arizona. Why, the gentleman went on to say that railroads are not taxed as they should be; that mines are not taxed as they should be. Concede it all, concede every word of it, and does that prove that we ought to have a joint State of Arizona and New Mexico? He says public sentiment is weak; that legislative judgment is weak in New Mexico, that it is weak in Arizona. Are you going to make it strong by putting two weak things together and outraging the judgment and the wishes of the people of Arizona? You say that when the railroad goes out of Arizona into California the assessment is increased and taxation is increased; that when it goes out of New Mexico into Texas the assessment is increased and taxation is increased. That is probably true. But why are we to infer that when these people are bound together who have made these laws and administered them that you are going to have a different order of things?

The gentleman says that mining property is under assessed and under taxed, and he proposes to take Arizona and unite it with New Mexico for the purpose of improving those conditions. Let me read to the gentleman from the report of the Secretary of the Interior about the character of assessments and taxation in the Territory of New Mexico.

The Secretary of the Interior says as to Arizona, taking into consideration the entire Territory and the property in the Territory with the exception of mines and railroads, it is stated that the assessments will average 35 or 40 per cent of the fair market value of the property. The Secretary of the Interior states the total valuation of property in New Mexico, including railroads and mines, to be $364,500,000, and the assessed valuation is only 15 per cent of this amount. In order to improve the conditions as to taxation in Arizona he proposes to join with that Territory New Mexico, which, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, only assesses its property 15 per cent of its valuation.

Let me say to the gentleman further what all of us know, that it does not make any difference what your percentage of assessment is as long as it is uniform. Make it 10 per cent, 20 per cent, 30 per cent, or 100 per cent, the thing that gives justice in assessment and taxation is uniformity.

The gentleman is horrified because some of the mines are unquestionably under assessed in the Territory of Arizona. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HAMILTON. The governor of Arizona says that they are not uniformly assessed.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Wait a moment. The gentleman will have all the time he wants, and he can ask me all the questions he desires if he will extend my time. The gentleman says mining property in Arizona is under assessed. That is undoubtedly true, but the gentleman knows that the value of a mine is one of the most indefinite things upon earth. It may be worth nothing and it may have a value of millions. Nothing is more difficult of actual ascertainment than the value of a mine unless it be the value of a patent.

No sane and honest man advocates under assessment of any kind of property. The chairman of the Committee on Territories criticises severly the mining assessments of Arizona and New Mexico. The inference is that he believes that when these Territories are made a single State under assessments will case. The chairman of the Committee on Territories knows perfectly well that unfair and inequitable assessments of property are common and a subject of constant complaint in every State in the Union, that the evil is not confined to Territories, and that it runs rampant in some of the States.

It was stated as a fact by Senator Clarke in a hearing before the Committee on Territories that the great Calumet-Hecla copper mine in the State of Michigan was assessed a less amount in proportion to its real value than the copper mines of Arizona. The copper mines of the Lake Superior region have been the leading copper mines of the world for many years, and Michigan has been a State for many years. And it is undoubtedly true that the assessments upon the comparatively new and less known copper mining properties of Arizona are closer to their real value than similar assessments in the gentleman's own State.

The people of Arizona, like the people of all mining States, have unquestionably very low taxation for their mining properties for the purpose of inducing capital to open up their mineral resources.

In 1900 Arizona had 113 producing mines and 381 mines in process of development. At the beginning of that year 1,085 patents and applications for mining patents had been filed in the land office.

On November 15, 1905, the record shows 1,620 patents and applications, or 50 per cent more than all that had been applied for previous to 1900. This indicates the rapid development of the mining interests of the Territory.

In ten years the production of copper in Arizona has increased 300 per cent. The total output of Arizona mines has doubled in three years, and it is believed that the Territory, within two years, will become first in production of copper.

The charge that the railroad and mining interests of Arizona are opposing joint statehood is true. The charge that they are using improper means in this opposition is not true. The men interested in the mines and railroads of Arizona would not have intelligence enough to run their mines and railroads if they favored the joint statehood scheme. The opposition to joint statehood does include the corporations of Arizona, but it also includes every business interest and also almost the entire population of the Territory of every class. The owners of mines and railroads necessarily have the same interest in the development of that Territory that all its people have. It is cheap partisanship to endeavor to prejudice the entire population of a great Territory by innuendo and false charges which excite the popular prejudice that exists everywhere against the exercise of corporation influence in matters of legislation.

Last October I visited Arizona and spent eight days in constant travel and observation in the Territory. I visited sixteen of the principal towns of the Territory and met many of its people. Outside of the public meetings I had many opportunities to talk with men of different classes in their places of business and as I met them in the streets, in the hotels, in the mining camps, and upon the railroads. I have never seen the people of any State or Territory more thoroughly united and more determined in their opposition to any measure of legislation than are the people of Arizona against the union of that Territory with New Mexico in a single State. From one end of the Territory to the other there is a whirlwind of indignant protest against the violation of the pledge made by the United States Government in the organic act which created the Territory in 1863, promising that Arizona should be made a State when the proper time came, upon the application of its people. The people of Arizona have not applied for joint statehood. They prefer to remain a Territory rather than lose the autonomy which they have had for nearly half a century—to be blotted from the map and made subordinate to the greater voting power of the Territory of New Mexico.

In round numbers, the assessed valuation of Arizona in 1905 was $58,000,000. The assessed valuation of New Mexico in 1905 was $42,600,000. Yet the joint statehood bill proposes to take Arizona with its assessed valuation of nearly fourteen millions greater than that of New Mexico and subject its property and its people to the domination of the New Mexican vote, which is nearly double that of Arizona and 50 per cent of which is Mexican.

Arizona has a school system which would do honor to any State in the Union. A strong compulsory education law is upon the statute books of that Territory. New Mexico has no compulsory education law and its people do not favor one. The school population of Arizona is 29,290, of which 23,766 are enrolled. New Mexico has a total school population of 68,193, with an enrollment of 36,111 and an average attendance of only 17,301.

The joint statehood bill provides that appropriations shall be continued to the agricultural colleges and experiment stations of each Territory, but this continuance is not likely to be permanent. No other State in the Union gets a double proportion of the Federal appropriation for agricultural colleges and experiment stations, and sooner or later Federal aid would be withdrawn from the college and station in one Territory or the other.

It is claimed that agriculture can never be very greatly developed in Arizona, yet the Indian and forest reservations include 26,000,000 acres.

It is estimated that the reclaimable grazing lands of the public domain include 13,000,000 acres, and the board of equalization reports state that there had been located and were taxed in Arizona in 1905 11,257,385 acres. In 1895 the taxable acreage was 3,862,282. In ten years the increase had been 291.5 per cent. In ten years the valuation of this property, with improvements, had increased 161.5 per cent. The railroad and other properties had increased 179 per cent. In ten years the school census indicated an increase of 126 per cent. The vote in 1904 had increased in ten years 59.4 per cent. The population, according to the governor's estimate, in that time had increased 120 per cent. The wealth per capita had increased 82 per cent. The banking capital, surplus, and money on deposit had increased 729 per cent.

These figures indicate beyond question the rapid development of Arizona in recent years.

The Secretary of the Interior, in his report, states:

> Arizona has a great wealth of forests, one of the largest unbroken forests in the world lying between San Francisco Mountain and the Black Mesa Forest Reservation, aggregating 600,000 square miles.

The Secretary states further that the completion of systems of irrigation now in progress and contemplated would increase the area of irrigated land in the Territory to nearly a million acres, and that at the present time there are 250,000 acres under irrigation.

During my visit to the Territory I spent several days in the company of Mr. Louis C. Hill, the Government engineer in charge of the construction of the famous Tonto dam, at Roosevelt. He told me that the water which would be held by that dam would be sufficient to irrigate more land than is now irrigated in southern California. Mr. F. R. Newell, of the United States Geological Survey, who designed the Tonto dam, is authority for the statement that there are 800,000 acres of land in Arizona which can be reclaimed by irrigation.

The pine forests of the Territory cover 12,000 square miles, and the value of the timber is estimated at $300,000,000.

It is absurd to claim that there is not enough agricultural land in Arizona to support a population which would warrant independent statehood. There is no place in the world where an acre of land under irrigation and proper treatment will be more productive than in Arizona. The climate and the soil are admirably adapted to the raising of fruit, including pears, peaches, grapes, oranges, and nearly every other fruit which is produced anywhere in the United States. Arizona can raise everything that is produced in that wonderful garden, southern California. It has agricultural land enough, when irrigated and properly handled, to support a population more than twice as great as the State of Rhode Island and greater than that of 25 per cent of the States now in the Union.

But if the agricultural possibilities of Arizona were as limited as is claimed by the friends of joint statehood, her mining resources would be great enough to support a population large enough to entitle that Territory to admission to the Union at some future day as an independent State. While agriculture is a great and important interest, it is not the only one. Pennsylvania, with her 6,000,000 of people, has only 1,000,000 upon the farms of that State. Only a small proportion of some of the Eastern States, like New Jersey, Delaware, and Rhode Island, which are insisting upon joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, have a very large proportion of their people engaged in agriculture. If the claim were true that there is very little agricultural land in Arizona, it would not be a sufficient reason for the outrage upon public sentiment in that Territory in combining it with New Mexico. The people of Arizona are not asking for independent statehood at this time. They know enough to know that the development which is now going on in that Territory through the building of railroads, the increase in manufactures, the development of mines, and the growth of her cities because of climatic advantages, which are attracting many from Eastern States, are certain in the course of years to give her a population large enough to demand and obtain entrance into the Union of States.

Why can not these people be let alone? What extreme necessity exists for outraging the unanimous sentiment of the people of a great Territory?

It is claimed that this is a clear question of politics. It is claimed that the Republican party has been committed to the joint statehood scheme.

There is but one way in which the Republican party can be committed to anything in a certain and authoritative manner and that is by the platform declarations of a national Republican convention.

In 1896 the national Republican platform declared in favor of immediate statehood for New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma. It did not declare for joint statehood for any of these Territories.

The Republican platform of 1900 again declared that New Mexico and Arizona should be made States.

In the Fifty-eighth Congress a measure was suddenly brought out of the Committee on Territories providing that Arizona and New Mexico be joined in a single State, and within three days a bill for this purpose passed the lower House. It failed in the Senate, defeated largely through Republican votes.

Joint statehood has been recommended in a brief paragraph in the message of the President to the Fifty-ninth Congress. A conference of the Members of the House of Representatives, and not a caucus, was held to consider it. An effort has been made to stamp the bill with a party label. It is not and can not be a party measure in defiance of the platforms of the party.

Very little effort has been made in this discussion upon the part of the friends of joint statehood to make a real argument for it. There has simply been an appeal to the Republicans of the House to stand together and make it a thoroughly political question. Considered from even that standpoint, the joint statehood bill is distinctly prejudicial to Republican interests. In the course of time Arizona will certainly be a Republican State if it is fairly treated. The influx of capital to that Territory is from the North. The increased population comes from the North. Originally the Territory was settled by people from the Southern States who were largely of Democratic origin and belief, but conditions have changed and every year increases the Republican vote. If the House of Representatives had not passed the joint statehood bill at the last session of Congress, and thereby indicated its unfriendliness to Arizona, there would be a Republican Representative from that Territory on the floor of this Chamber instead of a Democrat. Even in the face of this record, and with MARK SMITH running on the Democratic ticket, one of the strongest and most popular men in the Territory, who, as I have occasion to know, is greeted as "MARK" all over the Territory by people of all classes and parties, and who is a friend of everybody, warm-hearted and enthusiastic in his love for his Territory and his people, the Democratic majority was less than 800. Not only this, but it is not good Republican policy to commit a wrong or to disregard public sentiment.

Even accepting the mistaken theory that Arizona would send Democrats to the United States Senate, what particular necessity exists for the use of such extraordinary means as this for guarding and maintaining the Republican majority in that last citadel of a defeated party, the United States Senate? Is the Republican party in any special danger? Is it likely to enter upon a course of action which will jeopardize its hold upon the American people? Is it not the purpose of the leaders of the party to make it worthy of public support, and do they fear to go to the people of the Territory of Arizona upon the merits of their party principles and the cleanness of their political record?

Even conceding what will not happen, if Arizona is made an independent State and two more Democrats sent to the United States Senate, do these gentlemen imagine that the foundations of the Republic would be shaken and the heavens roll away like a scroll?

When did it become a crime to be a Democrat? There are about six or seven millions of men in this country who usually follow the Democratic flag and vote for Democratic candidates for office. They form a considerable part of the citizenship of this Republic. They pay their taxes and support the laws of the land. They are just about as ready to fight in defense of the national honor as the men who vote the Republican ticket. They are built just about as we are. They want order in society and honesty and wisdom in government. We differ radically with them upon some great public questions, but it is an honest difference of judgment. We must concede to the great body of the Democratic party the same integrity of purpose which we claim for ourselves. The evils which might follow the admission of two more Democrats to the United States Senate do not compare with the harm which would be done to the Republican party if this Congress consummated the outrage of passing the joint-statehood bill in defiance of the wishes of nearly all the people and of every material interest in the Territory of Arizona. When a great political party undertakes to do a wrong, it should think up some other excuse than the plea of political expediency.

In the discussions in the House of Representatives and out of it the people and the interests of Arizona have been misrepresented, and the Members of Congress who objected to joint statehood have been misrepresented and maligned by reports circulated that a mining and railroad lobby are in Washington using corrupt means to prevent the passage of this bill. There is not a shadow of truth in these reports. Not a shred of evidence can be found by all the detectives in Washington. These reports have been circulated, and circulated until they have reached the ears of many honest men, unconscious of their source and unconscious of their malignity, and have been believed to the prejudice of men who are fighting loyally and sincerely and honestly for the interests of the people of Arizona.

A distinguished citizen of Indiana seems to have had a curious misapprehension of the facts about Arizona, and the character of the contest which has been carried on to preserve her political independence. The character of his investigation of the conditions in the Territory by personal contact with the people of Arizona is described in a letter of Mr. William E. Curtis to the Chicago Record-Herald, dated Prescott, Ariz., August 11, 1905, from which the following is an extract:

> The people down here can not understand why Senator BEVERIDGE and others should be so determined to unite the two Territories. They see no reason why he and other outsiders should be so keen to place them under the domination of the Mexicans, and assert that no person who has any interest whatever in Arizona has ever asked for or approves of the amalgamation of the two Territories. Senator BEVERIDGE is even more unpopular down here than he is in New Mexico, and amusing stories are told of the manner in which he made his recent tour of investigation. When they first learned that he was coming, the governor and other officials of Arizona arranged a programme and itinerary over the different railroads, so that the committee, by special train, would be enabled to see all of the principal towns and mining districts and meet the representative citizens of each section. In the meantime, the boards of trade and other local organizations proceeded to prepare information bearing upon the resources, development, and conditions of the Territory, so that the committee might be fully posted as to its qualifications for statehood. A great deal of trouble was taken in making preparations for the instruction and entertainment of the party, and the programme required fifteen or sixteen days of travel and inspection.
> Imagine the disappointment and chagrin of the Territorial officials and the committees when Senator BEVERIDGE and his companions rejected their hospitality, repudiated their plans, and spent only three days in the investigation of the merits of Arizona for statehood. They reached Prescott a little before sundown, were driven around the city for half an hour, spent the evening at the residence of one of the leading citizens, and left the next morning at 11 o'clock. They stopped at Congress mine and went down about 3,000 feet into the earth. They arrived at Phoenix after dark, where several citizens called upon them at the hotel. The next morning they attended the opening of Justice Kent's court, took a drive of two hours, and authorized Governor Brodie to select two representative citizens to furnish the information desired. A good part of the afternnon was spent in the cross-examination of the gentlemen selected. A social reception was given the distinguished strangers at the Adams Hotel until midnight, when they left by special train for Tucson. There they spent an hour an a half in the investigation of the conditions and resources of that part of the Territory. They were then taken by special train via Benson to Bisbee, where they arrived at dark. After looking hastily over the town they resumed their train and rushed on to Deming in the night, and the investigation of Arizona was completed.

The committee was furnished with a good deal of written and printed information, but it is evident that little of it was examined, because of the frequent misstatements in their report. Altogether, the so-called investigation was a ridiculous farce, and Senator BEVERIDGE and his associates must have behaved in a very undignified and childish manner.

The statesman from Indiana, upon the basis of such an investigation as described by Mr. Curtis, professes to know more about the wishes and interests of the people of Arizona than the people themselves know. He endeavors to discredit as entirely untrustworthy the experience of men who have taken some pains and have spent much more time than he, with just as much sincerity as he can possibly possess, to find out the exact truth. The innuendos and the slanders about the people of Arizona and their representatives who are before Congress seeking to make Congress know the facts about that Territory have had some effect, and there are Members of this House who will vote against their convictions and their judgment, fearing that if they vote as they know they ought they will be charged with unworthy motives. In other words, men are doing wrong for fear somebody will think they have been bought to do right. Insinuations have been made upon this floor that the men who oppose this bill have been animated either by personal pique, by disappointed ambitions, or because of some direct or indirect connection with the mining and railroad interests of the Territory, which, it is charged, are endeavoring to escape taxation. It is a common practice with lawyers who have a weak case to abuse the parties on the other side. It is a practice common in justice courts, but is hardly to be expected in the Congress of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania taunted the Republicans in the House who are opposed to this bill with being compelled to go to the Democratic leader to obtain time in this discussion. The gentleman from Mississippi immediately interrupted him and inquired if he would have granted these gentlemen time upon such requests to him. The gentleman from Pennsylvania immediately and emphatically said, "No; not one minute." This is the spirit in which this bill is being pushed in the House, and it is done in the name of republicanism.

It is claimed that Arizona does not have people enough to warrant independent statehood. Twenty States have been admitted into this House at a time when their average population was far less than Arizona now has.

It is a novel proposition to advance, either directly of indirectly, that the capacity and efficiency of United States Senators is in direct ratio to the size of the States from which they come. A Senator from the small State of Rhode Island has more power in the highest legislative body of the nation than both Senators from the greatest State in the Union. It is absurd and unfair to claim that Senators from the smaller Western States are any more of a menace to the national well-being than the Senators from New Jersey, Delaware, Rhode Island, or Vermont.

What is the basis of the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in this question there is to be considered on one side the interests of 80,000,000 people and on the other side the interests of less than 200,000 in the Territory of Arizona? Have the people of Arizona any interests that are not common to the people of the United States? Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania expect that in the event Arizona becomes a State her two Senators will swoop down upon the ninety other Senators and make a successful assault upon righteous law and just government? Does he not know that the people of Arizona have fought the battles of frontier life as bravely as any of the splendid army of pioneers who, beginning with the landing on Plymouth Rock, have built up the enlightened States of New England, the magnificent Commonwealths of New York and Pennsylvania, have made the Mississippi Valley the garden of the world, and have established great States upon the Pacific coast? Does he imagine that the men who own the hundreds of millions of property now being developed in Arizona through the best forms of American genius and the best examples of American industry, who have built up a civilization there which would be a credit to any State upon the globe, who have the same devotion to the Constitution of the United States and its flag as the people of any other State, will suddenly, upon the admission of Arizona, reverse the principles of their lives and the order of their action and become a menace to the welfare of the nation? Does he think that Navahos and bandits still dominate at Tombstone and Tucson, at Flagstaff and Prescott, at Bisbee, with its 15,000 busy people, at Phoenix, the beautiful capital, and in the many thriving cities of the Territory? A population which had its basis in brave men and braver women, who dared dangers from hostile savages, who reclaimed deserts amid innumerable dangers, and opened up the vast sources of inexhaustible wealth in the jeweled hearts of Arizona's mighty mountains are a people who will know enough to appreciate the wisdom of Washington, the splendid patience and charity of Lincoln, the statesmanship of McKinley, the lofty character and high purposes of Theodore Roosevelt, and those principles of liberty, justice, and equality which permeate American law and inspire those men who have been the great leaders of every party and the honored representatives of every section.

Arizona and New Mexico should not be joined in a single State—

Because each is entitled to independent statehood;

Because this country needs more western representation in the Senate;

Because the people of Arizona regard joint statehood as an outrageous abuse of Federal power;

Because, that being the sentiment of Arizona people, it would be an abuse of Federal power;

Because the faith of the nation was pledged in the act of 1863 to give the Territory of Arizona statehood at the proper time upon the application of her people;

Because her people have not applied for jointure, but have protested against it;

Because Jefferson was right when he said governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed;

Because Lincoln's plea for a government of the people, for the people, and by the people will be disregarded if this bill becomes a law;

Because the Republican party has declared for independent statehood for these Territories in its platforms and because platform promises should be kept: and

Because it is the height of political wisdom to be right and the depth of political folly to be wrong.

If New Mexico has people enough to warrant statehood now, make her a State. If she has not, do not repeat the old Roman crime against the Sabine women by forcing Arizona into the arms of New Mexico in order that a quorum may be counted.

If Arizona has not people enough to warrant statehood now, wait until she has people enough.

Her people have committed no crime in failing to multiply to the required standard. Many of them have fought the battles of the Republic on bloody fields. Most of them are now fighting honorably the battles of peace in the many activities of Arizona's religious, educational, professional, business, political, and industrial life.

Let them alone.

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KLEPPER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KLEPPER] is recognized.

Mr. KLEPPER. Mr. Chairman, if it were not for the fact that I represent one of the best districts in one of the best States in the Union, containing 200,000 law-abiding, intelligent, God-fearing people, and for the further fact that I have in the committee room voted for this bill, I would hesitate to speak on this measure, not because I do not favor it, for I do, but because of the fact that I am advised that the "kids" of the House are to be seen and not heard. The President, in his message to this Congress, made this recommendation:

I recommend that the Indian Territory and Oklahoma be admitted as one State, and that New Mexico and Arizona be admitted as one State. There is no obligation upon us to treat Territorial subdivisions, which are matters of convenience only, as binding us on the question of admission to statehood. Nothing has taken up more time in the Congress during the past few years than the question as to the statehood to be granted to the four Territories above mentioned, and after careful consideration of all that has been developed in the discussions of the question, I recommend that they be immediately admitted as two States. There is no justification for further delay, and the advisability of making the four Territories into two States has been clearly established.

That the Constitution gives to Congress the absolute power to fix boundaries, impose conditions not expressly prohibited by the Constitution in the admission of Territories as States into the Union, I believe is fundamental and can not be questioned. We have heard much said about the Continental Divide, running along between these Territories—New Mexico and Arizona—and our friends who oppose this measure would have us believe that there is a rugged chain of mountains running along the line that separates them; that the Creator, when He spoke this continent into existence, formed a natural barrier between the Territories which makes intercommunication inconvenient if not impracticable, while the facts are that the first bill introduced, the first proposition to divide the Territory, did not divide it on a meridian of longitude, but divided upon a degree of latitude. From the best information I have been able to gather this so-called "range of mountains" is in fact and reality a high plateau, with an occasional mountain peak raising its head above the surrounding country. The most of it is so level on the top that pools and lakelets of water form, there to stay until the water is evaporated. There is not a point on the boundary line that touches the Continental Divide. In fact, it is from 25 to 145 miles distant from the boundary line to points on this so-called "Continental Divide." Four railroads cross this so-called "insurmountable barrier"—the Santa Fe, Lordsburg and Clifton, Southern Pacific, Phelps-Dodge Company's road, and the Santa Fe is now projecting a branch which will run into Phoenix.

It is true, as stated by the President, that nothing has taken up more time during the past few years than the question of statehood to be granted these Territories. In fact, New Mexico and Arizona have been a part of this domain for nearly sixty years, and it seems they have been putting in a good deal of their time knocking on the door, seeking admission into the Union of States, but without success. A bill for the admission of New Mexico has passed one House or the other of Congress seventeen times, and has passed both Houses of Congress twice but failed in conference. Arizona has applied for admission about a dozen times, and so the experience of the past with these Territories would lead to but one conclusion, and that is this: That the sentiment of this country is against the admission of either of the Territories as a single State. There are a few things that should be carefully considered in approaching the subject of the admission of these Territories. The welfare of the nation and the welfare of the Territories. In discussing this it is pertinent to suggest this question: First, the preparedness of the Territories for statehood. Have they a citizenship sufficiently enlightened, capable, and worthy of having extended to them the full right granted other citizens of the nation? Second, have they territory sufficient to support a population large enough to make a respectable State?

On the first proposition I believe it will be admitted that the people of these Territories are capable and worthy of having accorded to them the full rights of citizenship. There are many States in the Union that have a greater percentage of illiterates than have the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, so I believe it is not even a debatable question that the people of these Territories are entitled to the blessings of statehood. It is true that their numbers are small as compared with many of the other States, for by the most liberal estimates there is less than one-half million in both the Territories.

The governor's report only claims for Arizona 140,000 people, while Mr. Rodey, ex-Delegate from New Mexico, admits she has 175,000 population, and the last census gives to her 122,931. So according to these figures the population of Arizona, at the most liberal estimate, is less than that of the average Congressional district from the various States of the Union. This is her present condition as regards population; but now as to her possibilities, and in this connection I desire to say that, in my humble opinion, the Territory of Arizona has not, nor will she ever have, sufficient population to make a respectable State as compared with the other States of the Union. To-day, according to the Reclamation Service, 247,000 acres of the lands of Arizona are under irrigation, while, according to the estimates of the Geological Survey, this area can only be increased 500,000 acres, which will make a total of approximately 747,000 acres. The total area in acres is 72,332,800, while, as you see from these figures, and they should be accepted as authority, the total possible irrigable lands is just about 1 per cent of the area of the Territory. Now, to emphasize this argument that the Territory of Arizona has not sufficient natural resources to maintain a population to make a respectable State, but she of necessity must submit to a merger with her sister Territory, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], on the committee, may be surprised when I tell him that in his splendid district he has nearly five times as many acres of productive land as by the most liberal estimates can ever be irrigated in the Territory of Arizona alone, for his district contains 3,376,640 acres, while the assessed valuation of the land in the gentleman's district in 1902 is $58,791,463, as against $42,000,000 for the entire Territory of Arizona, while the crops growing in 1902 in this gentleman's district amounted to $15,623,965, while the live stock for the same year was assessed at $27,578,822; and his is not the only good district in the State of Missouri, for the ten counties that I have the honor to represent have lands that were in 1902 assessed at $72,013,687, of crops she produced $19,067,676, while of live stock she produced $34,652,435. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call your attention to the fact that the total assessed taxable wealth of New Mexico, according to the governor's report, is at the present time not to exceed $42,000,000, while out of a total area of over 78,000,000 acres of land only 250,000 are in cultivation under irrigation, and, according to Government experts, it will only be possible at the most liberal estimates to reclaim by irrigation 1,000,000 acres.

It will thus be seen, Mr. Chairman, that according to these reports and according to the estimates of the Geological Survey these two vast Territories when combined will not have to exceed one and three-quarter million acres under cultivation or irrigation. Land in the semiarid region without irrigation is in most instances as cropless as rocks. Gentlemen must never forget when considering this question that the average population per State of this Union is at the present time a little over 1,500,000 people, and the majority of American opinion is that we have too many States now far below that reasonable average in population, and even the one we are now considering will have but about one-third of the one and a half million of population. Statistics show that the great States of this nation are in recent years increasing proportionately quite as fast as the smaller States, and this average of population for statehood will in the future increase rather than diminish, and therefore it may well be said that at no time in the future will the condition of these Territories as to population in comparison with the rest of the nation warrant their admission separately. Then, as the President has well said, there is no reason for further delay.

Oklahoma and Indian Territory combined at this time just about come up to the full requirements. But one of the principal arguments advanced on the floor of this House as against the merger of these western Territories is that you unite two peoples dissimilar in educational attainments, national character, and race; that it is a great injustice to the people of the Territory of Arizona to be forced into an unholy wedlock with the people of New Mexico. The pharisaical phrase of "I am holier than thou" has been dinned into the ears of the committee, and the same spirit is manifest here on the floor of the House. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I will call the committee's attention to the testimony of the Reverend Shields, who is before the committee from Arizona protesting against the jointure. I think his testimony should carry great weight, as he spoke from a knowledge of conditions obtained by actual contact with the people of New Mexico and those of Arizona, as he has lived for a number of years in each of the Territories. This question was asked by Mr. KLEPPER:

Q. I believe you stated you lived in New Mexico a while?—A. I was there four years.

Q. You had occasion, I suppose, to get pretty well acquainted with the Mexican people over there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What class of citizens are they, in a general way? What are their leading characteristics?—A. I think as a rule the Mexicans are an exceedingly conservative people, and a people who prefer to live according to long-time traditions. I think they are a quiet, pastoral people, inclined to obey the laws, and yet a people with whom the Anglo-Saxon people does not amalgamate very much. I think the fact that a child born of a union between an American white man and a Mexican woman being called a "coyote" indicates the feeling.

Q. Is it not a fact that the Mexicans do not attempt to dominate in politics?—A. Yes.

Mr. COLE, of the committee, asked this question of this same witness:

Q. What is the standard of morality among the New Mexicans—the people of Spanish extraction there?—A. I have no reason to believe but what a majority of the people are true to their marital vows; nearly all of them are Roman Catholics, and we know that the priests in the Roman Catholic Church try to hold up a high standard to them.

Mr. HAMILTON, the chairman of the committee, asked the same witness this question:

Q. And they are otherwise a moral people, are they not?—A. I say they are a quiet, orderly people—law-abiding.

Q. (By Mr. COLE.) Not difficult to govern, are they?—A. No; not difficult to govern, and yet not difficult to handle.

In this connection I would call the committee's attention to a statement made by Mr. ANDREWS, present Delegate from New Mexico:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a few days ago I was here at a meeting of the committee, and my friend Mr. MOON was present, and some others here, and I made a statement that I thought the native population of the State of New Mexico, which I have the honor to represent, would be 70 per cent native and 30 per cent American. There are twelve counties in the State of New Mexico which are American by a good majority. There are eight native counties and five that are divided—that is, part American and part native. I would say to Mr. MOON and others who were here that day that I think 50 per cent would be a fair average. I wish to somewhat change my statement made the other day. Mr. Rodey, who was my predecessor here, thinks that it would be less than 50 per cent native, but that would be my judgment.

Q. (By the chairman.) What proportion of these are English-speaking people?—A. I presume four-fifths of the natives speak English.

You might travel through the Territory everywhere—I have traveled all over it—and very seldom would you meet a native who could not talk to you in English. Of course, they have interpreters in the courts, as they have them in all the States. They have them in Pennsylvania, the State that I was born and raised in. There is hardly any State where they have any foreign population in which they do not have interpreters, but the educational clause is very strict in New Mexico and English is taught in the public schools.

Attention was called during these hearings before the committee to the fact that in many eastern cities there is a population of foreign extraction that in some instances amounts to almost half the residents; for instance, the great city of Chicago has 34.6 per cent of foreign-born citizens; Boston, the center of culture on this continent, which has an aristocracy of brains, has a foreign population of 35 per cent; Lowell, Mass., a foreign population of 43 per cent. And so I might go on with many other places with large percentages of foreigners—and remember these are real foreigners—people born in other countries, while these native New Mexicans are every one born on the soil of New Mexico, and are no more to be classed as foreigners than are the Acadians of Louisiana, who are of French extraction, or the Penn colonists of Pennsylvania.

I submit that these New Mexicans, the vast majority of whom are of pure Castilian extraction, the highest type of the original Americans, of the Caucasian race, and the people who blazed the way for all European nations on this continent. (The few thousands of New Mexicans who are mixed with the Pueblo Indians do not in a sense detract from the truth of this general statement.) I say these people are vastly superior to some of the elements that come through Castle Garden annually to scatter over the country and who are now and have for these many years helped to govern the people in these Territories, for last year we received from foreign lands a million immigrants to dilute our civilization. Evidence was submitted to the committee that the natives of New Mexico of Spanish extraction are lawyers, doctors, clergymen, educators, and editors in about the same proportion to their numbers as are those of the other races inhabiting the Southwest, and we are assured that as to this class there is practically no difference between them and others of the community save that they possess the accomplishment of being thoroughly conversant with two modern languages instead of one. I might add that one of the principal good things that can be said about them is that as a class the entire native population of New Mexico has sense enough to be intensely Republican in politics. And as I have for the first time in the course of my remarks mentioned politics, I may say that the opposition, coming from the minority side of the House, is, in my judgment, not so much because they wish to sever the provisions of this bill as to these western Territories, as the opportunity it has offered them to sever on the floor of this House the membership of the majority. As a type of the much-abused native New Mexican, I would call your attention to the late governor, Mr. Otero. I am informed that his father, though a native-born New Mexican, was a type of the high citizenship of that country and was a professor of Greek in Poughkeepsie College, New York, in his younger days, and his mother was a Miss Blackwood, of St. Louis, Mo.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. REID] stated yesterday on the floor of this House that there was no evidence submitted before the committee showing that the great interests of Arizona were interested in the question of statehood or in opposing it; but I would remind the gentleman that if he will refer to the published hearing before our committee he will, on page 78, find a letter submitted by Mr. Fowler, of which Mr. Douglass, head of the Phelps-Dodge enterprises, an Englishman by birth, is the author:

I have in my hand something I think will be of special interest to the chairman and some of the members of the committee, because they have inquired particularly in regard to the Copper Queen mine and the owners and what their attitude is upon this question of statehood. I want to read this article (reading from newspaper):

The New York Tribune last week interviewed Prof. James Douglas on the subject of statehood legislation, and said:

"Dr. James Douglas, who is the executive head of the mining enterprise in Arizona grouped as the Phelps, Dodge & Co. interests, was seen in his office, No. 99 John street, yesterday afternoon and gave his views upon the proposed joint statehood of Arizona. Doctor Douglas said:

"It seems almost futile for one identified with corporate interests in either of the Territories to voice his views in opposition to joint statehood. Those who favor the proposition charge us with selfish and ulterior motives. My answer is that we are merely reflecting the sentiment of practically every intelligent citizen of Arizona in our opposition, and to the charge that those interested in mining operations in the Territory are maintaining a lobby at large expense in Washington to promote separate statehood, I am able truthfully to assert that Phelps, Dodge & Co. are not spending a dollar for that purpose. The only thing we have done was on the occasion of the visit of the Territorial Committee of the House to Arizona last summer, when we afforded the Congressional party the facilities of our railroad and accorded them the usual courtesies of ordinary hospitality when they visited any of the points where our mines or smelting plants are situated. The Congressmen were under the escort of F. M. Murphy, who, with his brother, ex-Governor N. O. Murphy, has mining interests in another part of the Territory.

"'To force Arizona into a union with New Mexico is to do a great wrong to the people of the former Territory, who, in racial antecedents, religious preferences, and industrial interests, are wholly unlike the inhabitants of New Mexico. New Mexico has a population sufficient to justify her admission as a single State, and the people of Arizona, among whom I have spent more than twenty-five years of my life, would rather wait twenty years for statehood than be joined to New Mexico.

"'In the event of joint statehood the vast interests in Arizona would be outvoted and so controlled in the matter of taxation by the greater population of the present Territory of New Mexico, which is vastly less important in the value of its taxable property. The various interests of Phelps, Dodge & Co., including railroads and mines and smelters, employ fully 10,000 men, about three-fourths of that number in Arizona and the balance on the railroads and in the coal mines in New Mexico; and since more than 10 per cent of the population of Arizona is either employed in or dependent upon our various enterprises, we may fairly entertain the opinion that it is scarcely an impertinence for us to express views on questions that bear on the welfare of the people or of the great mining industry there.

"'I can well understand that it may seem desirable to substitute a State government for the Territorial form wherever it can be wisely accomplished, and I can also appreciate the political considerations that are involved in the contention for joint statehood, but neither should outweigh the injustice that would be involved in such an unfit alliance as that of Arizona and New Mexico.

"'Finally, I want it clearly understood that Phelps, Dodge & Co. have never been in politics and do not desire to enter that field, and that the insinuation that we are spending money to influence separate statehood or defeat joint statehood is a foundationless falsehood.'"

If he searches the record further, he will find that ex-Governor Murphy, of Arizona, testified before the committee, and he will recollect that it was stated that Mr. Murphy and his brother Frank, both of whom are at present in this city, are among the largest mine owners and railroad officials in the Territory of Arizona; further, the reports of the respective governors of these two Territories are before the committee, and references made in these reports, in no uncertain terms, to tax questions and Congressional laws existing in favor of these great interests and from which they reap tremendous benefit, that leave plenty of room for inference by the committee that the beneficiaries must inspire some of the strenuous opposition to this merger. Mr. Rodey, ex-Delegate from New Mexico, painted a picture in his three-hour statement before our committee of the thraldom in which these Territories are held by the railroad, mine owners, cattle interests, and officeholders that not only astonished many of us, but was positively appalling as a description of conditions. The gentleman from Arkansas has also forgotten the testimony submitted by the head of the Cattle Growers' Association of Arizona, Mr. Sturgis, who testified that the cattle interests of Arizona were opposed to this merger, and he submitted the following resolution:

Mr. Sturgis read the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Arizona Cattle Growers' Association in meeting assembled at Phoenix, Ariz., on the 29th day of December, 1905:

"First. That we are earnestly opposed to the jointure of Arizona and New Mexico as one State, as is proposed by the bill now pending in the United States Congress.

"Second. That we are as earnestly opposed to the jointure of Arizona and New Mexico under any proposition.

"Third. That we deem the bills now pending in Congress in the light of an attempt to force the people of Arizona—who hitherto have had for nearly half a century, and for a period covering all its growth and development, a separate political autonomy—to be subjected to the domination of a more numerous people of another country. The reasons for our opposition to the proposed jointure are numerous and, to us, controlling.

"That the proposed union is distasteful to us, that it would delay and hamper our further progress, that it would result in confusion of laws and consequent disastrous disturbance of business are among the many reasons completely obvious to us, who, by reason of residence, are familiar with conditions. It may be conceded that a Territorial form of government—in practice, at least—affords some just grounds to our people for complaint; but these evils are purely temporary, and with the lapse of time will be remedied. But we submit that if, as we sincerely believe would be the result, the proposed union would prove disastrous to and destructive of the future prosperity of our Territory to a very considerable extent, the great evil would be permanent and irremediable.

"We can and will submit to the evils of continued Territorial government rather than assume those incomparably greater evils which we fear will follow jointure.

"Whether our fears are justified or not, they exist. We are American citizens none the less than are the citizens of the States, and we claim that we have the right as such to dissent from the proposal of a State government to the constitution and establishment of which we do not consent.

"We can not resist the declaration that the proposed bills are in violation of the first principles of our American institutions—that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed.

"The proposition is un-American. We accordingly respectfully but earnestly protest against it.

"Passed unanimously, December 29, 1905.

[SEAL.] "ARIZONA CATTLE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION.
"JAS. E. BARK, President."

The CHAIRMAN. The only specification of possible injury growing out of the joining of New Mexico and Arizona in those resolutions is the statement that it would result in confusion of laws and consequently injury to business, is it not?

Mr. STURGIS. In those resolutions? Yes, sir. I do not know what their laws in New Mexico are, but I know they want to revise them and they have sent over to us for our sanitary and cattle laws.

The CHAIRMAN. And have they used them?

Mr. STURGIS. They have sent to us for them.

In addition to what has been said about the taxation of the railroads of New Mexico and Arizona, for it has been conclusively shown that they are inadequately taxed, I have been reliably informed that there is not in either of the Territories a single line of law on their statute books restricting, limiting, or controlling in any sense passenger or freight rates upon the railroads, and you may search the Supreme Court Reports of New Mexico, from lid to lid, through the entire set, in vain to find a single decision in a personal damage case against the railroads, and I am informed that the same is practically true in Arizona. Thus is added another reason why the railway interests of these Territories are not hunting for statehood. Gentlemen will easily appreciate that it is of vast importance to these great railroad interests to have the small empire of country embraced in the area of these two Territories so completely free from what they denominate annoying regulations of the people. According to the testimony of Mr. W. S. Sturgis, president of the Cattle Growers' Association of Arizona, she has, grazing over her broad domain, by his own admission, 750,000 head of cattle. These cattle are raised without expense to the owners, so far as rent goes, and they, with other live-stock interests, are strenuously opposed to statehood, for as soon as this bill becomes a law these cattle barons will be called upon to pay a small rental for the privileges they now enjoy, which will be turned into the school funds for the support of the public schools of Arizona. I am also informed that probably twice as many cattle as that, or nearly a million and a half head, graze over the public domain of New Mexico without paying a cent of rental for the use of the grass, and, of course, under statehood these cattle barons would also have to pay a similar small rental that would go to the schools. Statehood for the Territories may seem a little harsh to the live-stock interests of the Territories, but will be a blessing to the children of those jurisdictions who will attend the public schools; and there are those in this nation who can see greater wisdom in laws that will turn a revenue into the common schools of these Territories, than the want of laws, which permits free grass to be donated to cattle barons and the beef trust. As between free grass for the cattle barons of these Territories and free schools for the children of the Territories there certainly can be no difference in the minds of the membership of this Congress. But it has been insisted that the merger of these Territories will make a State so large as to work great inconvenience to the people, and yet the combined Territory, while large in area, is comparatively compact in form, and lacks more than 30,000 square miles of being as large as Texas. Another important fact is that the combined Territories are but about 650 miles across, while from several points in Texas it is but little greater than that distance to the capital of that State, which is somewhere near the center of Texas—perhaps somewhat east of it. The lower end of California is quite densely populated, and yet to reach the capital of that State, Sacramento, they must travel 620 miles, or just about 200 miles farther than it is from Phoenix to Santa Fe, and just about 200 miles farther than it is from Prescott to Santa Fe. The capital of Montana, Helena, is 420 miles from the east boundary of that State, while the people of western Nebraska must travel 430 miles to reach the capital, Lincoln. It is 420 miles from the north boundary of Idaho to the State capital, Boise City, while it is 580 miles from El Paso to Austin, Tex., and from the north end of Texas to Austin is 560 miles. It is 480 miles from Key West to Tallahassee, Fla., while it is 380 miles from Richmond to the southwest corner of Virginia; while the people of Houghton, in northern Michigan, travel 600 miles to reach the capital city, Lansing.

In some of the instances here cited the distances mentioned mean vastly more inconvenience in travel than do equal distances in the sunshiny Southwest, but at most these distances mean vastly less in these modern days of rapid transit, wireless telegraphy, telephonic communication, and improved postal facilities than they did in the early days of this Republic, when such things did not exist in the same degree. If these little distances are to be urged as a reason for opposition to this bill, then one wonders why the gentlemen who are so strenuously urging this objection did not embrace the same opportunity to suggest the removal of this capital city of the nation to somewhere in the vicinity of Kansas City, in my own State, and in this project I am sure it would be conceded there would be more unanimity than there is on their objections to this bill.

In conclusion, gentlemen, it might be well to call attention to the blessings that will come to the new State from the passage of this bill. The bill carries a donation of four sections of land per township, which, over the vast area, will amount, with that already donated in previous legislation, to something more than 20,000,000 acres to the new State. It has been calculated that the rentals from this land will bring a million of dollars per year to the schools, and with the interest on the donation of $5,000,000, which the bill also carries, and with a few licenses and fines thrown in, that the school fund will be almost from the start in the new great State a million and a half dollars per year. It has also been calculated that a moderate franchise tax ought to come very nearly sustaining the entire State government, and if this can be brought about, and there is no State tax and no school tax in the new State, then, indeed, will it be blessed! It has also been calculated that there is easily in the two Territories, subject to taxation, $500,000,000 worth of property, now grossly underassessed. When there is nothing but fixed charges, municipal and county taxes to raise, the argument which has been made before the committee that the tax levy can be limited in the very organic law of the new State to one-half of 1 per cent, is certainly well founded. If this can be brought about, how vast will be the changes in a few years! What blessings will this Congress have conferred upon the people of these Territories; how ridiculous, in a few years, will appear the arguments of the opposition, which are so strenuously made here at this time! How money will flow into such a country! How progress will take a jump forward! How immigration will flow in to enjoy such blessings! And when these things shall have been brought about, then indeed will it be in truth, as well as in name, Arizona the Great!

I respectfully submit, gentlemen, that the bill ought to pass. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, it shall not be my purpose to occupy at any length the time of the House to-day.

My opposition to this bill is not bounded by the outlines of the Territories that we are considering for statehood. That in itself, however, would be a sufficient reason.

I am strongly opposed to forcing these four Territories to come into our Union as two States. If Indian Territory and Oklahoma want to be united, well and good, but a union should not be forced upon Arizona and New Mexico. Each of them should be permitted to assume the responsibility of separate statehood by every reason that is fair and just.

Indian Territory, Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico, all of them are rich, and the years to come will develop their resources, multiply their wealth, and increase their population. To-day the smallest population of any of them is almost 200,000 people—the population of Arizona. The population of New Mexico is far greater than that, and the population of Oklahoma or Indian Territory more than two times as great. Measured by the standard of population numerically considered, the smallest of the Territories has a larger number of people living within its area than had any State at the time of its admission, except probably eight, admitted since the thirteen colonies bound themselves together in a union never to be dissolved. Aye, the population of those Territories is to-day equal to one-third the total population of the United States at the birth of our Republic, and yet they are denied representation in our national legislative body.

I am opposed to this bill, sirs, most of all on the broad ground that it is in direct conflict with the future welfare of the entire West. To-day the center of population is in the State of Indiana. Could a line be drawn directly from north to south through that center it would pass through the States of Michigan, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Florida. West of the tier of States just mentioned are to-day twenty-two States, represented by forty-four Senators; east of and including that tier are twenty-three States, represented by forty-six Senators.

The States east of and including that tier represent in area less than one-fourth of the United States, not including Alaska, while they have more than one-half of the Senators. Not only this, but the center of population will move still farther west, not east, and with the vast expanse of territory in the Central States that will support many times its present population, and with the great Pacific coast scarcely more than fifty years known as a home for the white race, who can grasp the tremendous population that must in a few more years find homes west of the line which divides in halves to-day the population of the United States? Suppose the center of population should be crowded west, even to the Mississippi River. One-third of the area of our country would still be on the east of that line, two-thirds would be west. The East would then be represented by fifty-two Senators, while the West, if no new States be added, would be represented by thirty-eight.

If you should admit every Territory that to-day asks for statehood, you would have added then but eight Senators to the thirty-eight, and still the East would have six more Senators than would be her fair proportion.

The West to-day has her share of representation in the United States Senate as nearly as Senators may be apportioned. It is the future that I look to when I contemplate this bill.

If some of the Western States to-day have not as large population as Eastern States, let me say that that defect will cure itself as the years go by. Not so with the Eastern States whose population is small.

Take, if you will, all the New England States—there are six of them—add to their area Delaware, then add New Jersey, and then you could add most of Maryland, and the combined area of them all—nine States—would only equal the approximate area of Idaho alone. Those States will be represented forever by eighteen Senators in the United States Senate, while Idaho forever will have but two. No matter what our population may be, and for years we have been growing at the rate of 10 per cent per year, and no matter if our population approaches that of the States I have just mentioned, it will make no difference; we still must be limited to two Senators. Take, if you please, the Atlantic seaboard. From Canada on the north to Florida on the south fifteen States border upon the ocean or have ocean harbors. Go, then, to the Pacific seaboard, and from Canada to Mexico three States extend. These States have six members in the United States Senate to represent their interests, while thirty Senators, one-third of the Senate of the United States to-day, represent the States bordering upon the Atlantic Ocean.

There will come a time when the Pacific Ocean will be as great a commercial factor as is the Atlantic Ocean. There will come a time when our cities will be as great cities as the cities of the East. There will come a time when our valleys and our hills, our vast expanse of land, will be as thickly settled as are the valleys of Massachusetts and Connecticut. Then will be the time that our representation will be unequal, unless that shall come which I do not expect, the division of the Western States into smaller Commonwealths.

I believe in the West and I have confidence in her future, and, sirs, to us is given the power of meting out justice and equality to succeeding generations. To place the limit which you propose in this bill upon the West for all time is not right. It is not justice. It is contrary to the spirit of the fathers who framed the Constitution. They desired equity. They wanted our National Legislature to represent the people in as equal proportion as might be possible. Only upon that foundation can greatest stability and greatest strength obtain. You are not passing this bill for to-day or for to-morrow, but for the great future. You are not legislating for the people for this year, but for the people of succeeding years.

Upon you rests the responsibility of doing that by legislation which our fathers did by hard warfare, and I appeal to you to stand by your judgment and by your conscience and vote in such a way as will bring credit upon yourselves and the great boon of equal and just representation to the generations yet unborn.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNE].

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Chairman, I feel like extending my congratulations to that unfortunately small but relatively very heroic body of men that had the temerity to stand up on yesterday and be counted, notwithstanding the edict of an alleged party leadership against this bill. I am somewhat of an expert, sir, on the subject of party rebellion [laughter], and it gave me a feeling of infinite pride to listen to the eloquent gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BEDE] in his valorous denunciation of the methods of this proposed legislation. He occupies the seat once occupied by myself from that great Commonwealth. It would seem, sir, as if rebellion were inheritable with that seat. I myself rebelled in it so hard ten years ago that I finally found myself entirely outside of the party breastworks. [Laughter.] My successor, the Hon. Page Morris, led a revolution in the last Congress but one on the beet-sugar proposition, and now one of the most eloquent and forcible champions of the rebellion upon this occasion is the gentleman who succeeded him in the same place.

I think I may venture to commend this example to other gentlemen upon the Republican side of the House. The very worst thing, gentlemen, that could possibly happen to you would be to follow your opinions at some time into a more congenial political association. [Laughter and applause.]

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that discussion of the merits of this proposition at this time is merely academic and destined to be futile. I shall therefore not spend any of the little time that has been assigned to me in the discussion of the provisions of this bill, provocative of discussion as many of them are; but I think the attention of the country ought to be called, Mr. Chairman, to the methods by which this legislation is to be accomplished and to the reasons that have been assigned in support of this procedure.

It was stated upon the other side of this Chamber repeatedly yesterday that this rule raises a party question, and the party whip was swung most vigorously and relentlessly by the expert wielders of discipline on that side of the Chamber with, unfortunately, its customary results. Now, sir, what is it that makes a question a party question? I read for the moment on this occasion from the remarks of that distinguished Athenian, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the whilom and universal champion of Republican policies, who rushed to the indefensible defense of this rule yesterday.

> It is enough for me to know, and it ought to be enough for any Republican to know, that the responsibility of the passage of this bill, if it shall pass, does not rest upon me or him. He will not be selected as an individual to be assaulted and assailed, but the responsibility will rest upon the great party of this country, headed by the great President of the United States, that, after a full consideration, has decided that this is the proper thing to do.

It will be noticed, Mr. Chairman, that throughout the discussion of this proposition on the other side there has not been advanced a single affirmative argument.

By the edict of a coterie temporarily invested with the autocratic power of deciding the legislative programme for the majority of this House, a proposition, indefensible in itself—and admittedly so or it never would have been brought in in this shape—the effect of which has been to shift the burden of proof, and ingenuity is exercised in defense of a position that it never could have occupied on its merits——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNE. I did not hear the observation of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TOWNE. I was not aware that I had started. I was under the impression that I had ten minutes instead of five. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRICK.]

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, it may be needless to talk more about statehood at this time. It is a subject that has absorbed the attention of most if not all of the Members of the House for four years—yes, for six years—and perhaps the verdict is all rendered as to what we will do and as to what we ought to do in reference to this question. I have listened with admiring sympathy to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] in his impassioned and surpassing vindication of the rights of his Territory, which he so ably represents, and I wish to say here and now that, although of diverse interests and of changeable opinions, of all the men I have met I have been as much or more impressed by the genial nature, the virile manhood, and enthusiastic loyalty of the gentleman from Arizona and of the former Representative from New Mexico, Mr. Rodey, as to any other men in the House. For years these gentlemen have been before this House in splendid eloquence pleading for the statehood of their respective Territories.

I regret not having had the opportunity to adequately know our Territorial possessions at first hand.

I do not mean by that the impressions photographed on the mind by a bird's-eye view of them taken from the platform of an observation car on a flying special train. That would contribute something, but not much, to a thorough appreciation of the situation.

Without being able to fully understand the breadth and depth of this statehood subject and divine the destiny of these lands beyond the hour of our action, I do share, in common with the majority of the Members of the House, the unprejudiced and disinterested desire to give the inhabitants of these Territories the fullest privilege of their citizenship commensurate with fairness toward all the other governmental divisions of the United States.

The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] says that we have been talking this matter for days. Yes, for years; "and yet," he thunders, "no one has given a single reason why there should be a jointure of Arizona and New Mexico." Now, without being able perhaps to enter into this discussion with the same warmth and overpowering mastery of feeling that animates my friend from Arizona, I have, as I conceive, the very best of reasons why there should be a jointure. In the first place, the admission of new States into the Union has always been a grave responsibility; one of the most important, perhaps, that could possibly engage the attention of Congress.

Important and responsible to the extremest degree, because it involves, first, the inalienable right of every American citizen to govern himself in the largest possible measure consistent with the rights of all, and I would not want to make a mistake as to that.

And then, again, important beyond the power of conjecture to meet, because whatever is done becomes at once a fact irrevocable and changeless for weal or woe through all the length of years and fate of time.

We may overcome many grievous errors by subsequent correcting legislation.

But when we admit a Territory into the sisterhood of States and a mistake is made, we have closed the door of reformation forever, and the Republic must bear the burden, even to its undoing, if that should happen.

And should we fail in this responsibility to rise to the occasion it will not be the first and only load of inequity and care that we have placed upon the shoulders of a representative form of government to tax its endurance and perpetuity.

It will not be rational to say, "This one act will be trivial, whatever the result;" and to invoke former acts as a precedent is simply emphasizing the clear call of duty, to lend discretion to our reason, forethought to our judgment.

Already necessity of expedient, or the arbitrary will and power of politics, has jangled out of tune the harmony of our State relations in representative capacity, many times reiterated, affecting the equities of countless millions and the coherent strength of our Government.

When our Constitution was adopted and a new nation born to the world, it was necessary to have the concerted action of every original settlement that it might gain all the forces which dwell in perfect unity.

Some of the States were small, but that fact sunk into apparent insignificance compared with the tremendous event of a compact Union, the only real Republic that had ever raised its flag to cheer the skies.

At that time we had a population of less than 4,000,000 of people, and thirteen States were bound together into a fledgling nation, now peerless among the powers of earth.

And because some of those States which were admitted under the stress and strife of that magnificent undertaking have equal representation in the Senate, far beyond the relative proportions of their territory, does not fortify a precedent or justify a repetition of such an event, unsanctified by any grounds of necessity or reason.

And then, again, there is no law of God or man that can evolve a multiplicity of evil into a virtue. Now, I want to give the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] some of the reasons why I say this jointure should be made.

To-day we have forty-five States, each represented in the upper House by two Senators.

Each one of them standing on absolute terms of equality, each one of them having more or less diverse interests and opinions, with equal opportunity to direct, forestall, obstruct, and fashion the legislation that covers all.

To-day the standard of representation in the House of Representatives provides a Representative for every 192,000 inhabitants.

And yet there are five States exercising the full force and effect of every other State, which have ten Senators and only five Representatives direct from the people.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then would it not be wise, if the gentleman will permit me, to listen to our prayer and leave us out? Would not that answer the gentleman's argument? Leave us out of the Union. That is all we ask.

Mr. BRICK. I will come to that later on; but that is only talking to the ear to deny the hope. I know what it means. I know that for years you have been asking to come in as a separate State. I know that the only reason you say "leave us out" is for the purpose of coming in as a separate State some day later on, and I say that, from all of the present knowledge we have of it, and from all that human judgment can foretell, it is now and will be forever unjust to the other 80,000,000 people. Think of it. Five States with ten Senators and five Representatives, four of them not having enough population to justify a Representative alone.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But, if the gentleman will permit, here is the point that we make. Thinking that we have rights that ought to be respected, why would you pass a bill providing for the admission of Arizona into the Union on such terms as New Mexico might prescribe and providing for the payment of the bonds of New Mexico out of the funds of the Territory of Arizona and for other hellish purposes? What argument is that against the fact? Is it fair that we might come in some day later? Is that the whole drift of the gentleman's speech?

Mr. BRICK. Well, I will answer that. To the best of my belief, as I have said before, Mr. Chairman, for years, so long that the memory of man hardly runneth to the contrary, these Territories have asked to be admitted as a State. Away down in their hearts they want to be a State; the average man, the inhabitant——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is not reprehensible, is it?

Mr. BRICK. As I was about to finish when you cut me off, the average man, the good-faith inhabitant of Arizona, away down in his heart is willing and glad to have a State on such conditions; but it is the mine owners and railroads who do not want it to become a State, because they fear it will raise their taxes, because they apprehend they will have to pay a more just proportion of taxation. If they would only let them alone, the common people of the State of Arizona will join with the people of New Mexico in accepting the provisions of this bill and become one of the sisterhood of States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. One further question. Will the gentleman give the source of that information?

Mr. BRICK. The source of my information is found in the well-known and uncontroverted fact that these corporate influences have been used with powerful effect against statehood in any form.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Now that they oppose single statehood, and to prevent further interruption, will the gentleman please tell the Members of this House that with the present Arizona and New Mexico legislatures, having all the powers as far as taxes are concerned that they would have as a State, individually or collectively—how with the same people elected, the same class of men, the effect of joint statehood is going to relieve the question? And if it be true—and I deny the assertion of the gentleman—but if it be true, will you suggest some way of relief this is going to make in the new combined two corrupt States, according to your statement, and how it will be any easier or harder for these corrupt influences to dominate than they can do now? How is the statehood bill going to effect that; and would it not have the effect, if it were true, to make it easier?

Mr. BRICK. It has been known ever since the dawn of time that whenever you place an officer upon his responsibility to his constituents and to his people at their very doors that he will then look after the duties of his position with greater integrity, accuracy, and honesty than if the creating power of his destiny lies far away.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Why, what you say is just as true in a Territory with existing Territorial government.

Mr. BRICK. It is not true of all officers there.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is true of all the business of Territorial taxation just exactly the same as the States; not a particle of difference.

Mr. BRICK. Well, Mr. Chairman, I know as well as I can from the workings of human nature, from the testimony, and from all the surrounding circumstances of this bill that these people—these great corporate interests—for some reason or other, not filled to overflowing with charity, do not want to become a State under any conditions. And I am equally certain that they have no question but that they are better off as to taxation now than under statehood. They admit it privately.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Not a man in Arizona.

Mr. BRICK. And there can not be, I say to the gentleman from Arizona, any other logical inference than that they are doing it for their own purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Now, will the gentleman pardon me once more?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to remind Members that it is not in order to interrupt a speaker without obtaining permission first.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am asking the gentleman's permission as plain as I can. The Chair must not have heard me.

The CHAIRMAN. But permission must be obtained through the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but it is violated so constantly and there have been so few objections and——

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, my time is limited, and I have answered the question twice.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But you have not answered the inference you make about legislation being subject to these railroads.

Mr. BRICK. Now, I want to continue to give my reasons why the joint statehood provision of this bill is the only one in justice to the people of the country. Gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, I have said there are already five States that have ten representatives in the Senate with only five Congressmen in the House.

It matters not who perpetrated the act. Both parties have fostered it and both have drawn political sustenance from it.

And the fact still remains to stare us in the face, to guide and warn us not to repeat the mistake.

Five States with ten Senators, making up one-ninth of the entire Senatorial body, who might or might not, depending somewhat upon their ability, desire, and surrounding circumstances, control the legislation of the nation. In any event, they would powerfully affect it, beyond the realization of persons unacquainted with legislative affairs.

Now, it becomes still more significant when we come to know that these States having only five Representatives who do not stand for a constituency of 192,000 each, although they are the sole representative of a whole State.

These States have, respectively, the largest, of which I speak first, and the others, following in their order, 243,329, 184,735, 161,772, 92,531, 42,335, with a total population of 734,702, an average for each Representative of 146,940—about 45,000 less than the support of every other one of the great body of Representatives in the lower House.

Think of it! Five States, with ten Senators and five Representatives, four of them not having enough population to justify a Representative alone; one of them having but little more than one-fifth the requisite number, another not half enough, and the whole five on an average falling 45,000 each below the standard.

Compare this with other States, and I'll draw your attention to the smallest one of the Union in area—Rhode Island. It has a population of 428,556; Indiana, with 2,516,462; Texas, 3,048,710; Pennsylvania, 6,302,115; New York, 7,268,894; Illinois, 4,821,550; Wisconsin, 2,069,042; Ohio, 4,157,545; Missouri, 3,106,665; Minnesota, 1,751,394.

And still they all fare alike in point of representation in the Senate.

Yes, under our form of government, States are represented in the Senate as States, and I make no quarrel with the idea, even though it will always be impossible to make them of equal importance.

But before admitting them into that dignity and power they should possess the several qualities that will in a reasonable degree preserve and maintain an equilibrium of States in the Senate.

If they fall below that, it is unjust and unfair to all the other States.

Area alone can not control.

The greatness of a State or nation does not lie in the extent of its territory, but in the number and character of its people.

Therefore, area can only be considered in the light of the kind and number of people it will support in advancing growth and civilization.

For instance, Nevada was admitted as a State in the year 1864, with a population of about 42,491 and an area of 109,901 square miles—three times as large as Indiana. By the census of 1900 its population was 42,335, about one-fifth of a Congressional district under the last apportionment, while Indiana has grandly risen to 2,516,462, which entitled her to thirteen Representatives in the House. Yet Nevada, with only one-fifth enough people to grant her one Congressman, wields the same power in the Senate.

Mr. BEDE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BRICK. Certainly.

Mr. BEDE. Was not Nevada admitted into the Union for no other purpose than to help carry certain amendments to the Constitution? And was it nothing but a mining gulch, and everybody knew it at the time, and that it is not an example for any other State in the Union?

Mr. BRICK. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I do not care who committed the act or perpetrated the wrong, if it was wrong. Both political parties and all the people have sustained it, and abused it since then, and drawn undue political advantage from it; but it is no reason why they should do it again.

Mr. BEDE. I am not complaining of its admission; I am only complaining that the gentleman used it as an example. No other State has declined in population. Arizona and New Mexico are multiplying their population, and Oklahoma has two millions of population, and yet you refuse to let it in.

Mr. BRICK. I will answer that. I will draw one more illustration as to why we should not admit the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico to separate statehood now or at any other time.

Mr. BEDE. I am voting against admitting them at all. The gentleman wants to let them in; I want to keep them out.

Mr. BRICK. Let me give the gentleman this illustration. I know why you want them kept out. We all know what will happen some time in the future. They will either be admitted now in joint statehood or in the future in a separate statehood. Now is the time to settle it, and settle it right and settle it for once and forever, Mr. Chairman. [Applause.]

Now, let me illustrate in another way the manifest unfairness of such a condition as it actually exists by the following table:

State.	Senators.	Representatives.	Population.	Assessed valuation.
Delaware	2	1	184,735	$58,000,000
Idaho	2	1	161,772	31,000,000
Montana	2	1	243,329	186,000,000
Nevada	2	1	42,335	30,000,000
North Dakota	2	2	319,146	134,000,000
South Dakota	2	2	401,570	187,000,000
Utah	2	1	276,749	118,000,000
Vermont	2	2	343,641	2,000,000
Wyoming	2	1	92,531	43,000,000
Colorado	2	3	539,700	354,000,000
New Hampshire	2	2	411,588	286,000,000
Oregon	2	2	413,536	150,000,000
Rhode Island	2	2	428,556	413,000,000
Washington	2	3	518,103	261,000,000

We find that there are 14 States, with a representation of 28 in the Senate, composed of 90 Members, and not having sufficient population to warrant a representation of 24 in the House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BRICK. New York alone has 37 Representatives in the House, voicing a population far greater than the 14 States mentioned, with only 2 in the Senate to meet the 28 sent there by the other 14 States.

Are there any compensating qualifications that justify the situation?

It may be that the material wealth of the 14 States will aid in maintaining an equilibrium.

But no; New York has more than two and a half times as much assessed wealth as the combined valuation of the entire 14 States.

This is not a solitary exception, however, standing alone to relieve the comparison.

Pennsylvania has a population large enough to maintain 32 Representatives, and over one and one-half as much assessed wealth.

Ohio has 21 Representatives and property valued at about $2,000,000,000, as compared with $2,254,000,000 in the 14 States referred to.

Indiana and Massachusetts command 27 Representatives, with almost twice as great an assessed valuation.

Missouri and Michigan far exceed them in both population and values.

The same can be said of California and Illinois, Wisconsin and Texas.

They may wax stronger and grow greater in the future, it is suggested.

Mr. BEDE. May I ask the gentleman what he thinks the population west of the Mississippi River will be in a hundred years or a thousand years, and we are legislating for all time?

Mr. BRICK. Well——

Mr. BEDE. Is it not for a thousand years, and not for our generation?

Mr. BRICK. I believe, and hope, and pray that the population in the next five hundred years and during a thousand years will flourish and grow great in every State in the Union east and west of the Mississippi. I am for all the United States; my heart is with every corner of American soil.

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS. Does not the gentleman think the disparity of population will be maintained by the increase in population in the States east of the Mississippi River?

Mr. BRICK. I certainly do.

Mr. BEDE. Never.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BEDE. History does not show that.

Mr. BRICK. If gentlemen will excuse me, I can not yield any more. I have only two or three minutes left.

Now, I say in common fairness it must be conceded that these Territories will grow.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BRICK. I can not yield any further, Mr. Chairman. But in all reason no one in his most hopeful dreams could imagine anything like an adjustment of their unequal relations.

With these suggestions fairly in mind, we are met by the claims and controversies, the hopes and fears, involved in the bill under consideration, which by a single title and enacting clause enables two States to join the Union, and disposes in one clean sweep of all our remaining contiguous Territorial possessions.

It proposes to join Oklahoma and Indian Territory into a State to be called Oklahoma, and the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico into another, called Arizona.

All of these Territories have for many years been clamoring for the privileges of statehood, and the time has now arrived when this demand will be fulfilled if enough of us can agree upon the conditions of their admission.

A number of considerations present themselves in solving the problem as to what should be done, which have provoked serious conflicts of opinion and interests.

But in all good faith the ultimate results should encompass the real questions involved; fitness of the people morally, intellectually, and numerically to strengthen and dignify the Union.

Is the Territory seeking admission so developed in material wealth and the right kind of population as to entitle it to statehood and representation in Congress on a footing of equality with all the other States?

What are its prospects in the future?

Has it such reasonable hope of further development that will enable it to walk abreast with the average State, or will it lag behind in the march of progress?

All these questions can be settled without controversy in the case of Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

The people residing there are practically unanimous in wanting the two Territories combined into one exultant, splendid State. It will have an area of 69,830 square miles of arable land, or 44,691,200 acres, all of it capable of development to support homes and produce untold wealth.

Its population has increased and will continue to do so with marvelous rapidity.

In 1900, as shown by the census of that date, they together had a population of 790,391 people, most of them white, intelligent, sturdy, self-reliant, industrious citizens, of the best type of American manhood.

And it is now estimated by everyone whose judgment is worthy of belief that their aggregate population will amount to something like a million and a half.

There is no better farming land anywhere, and lately the products of the farm have been augmented by vast stores of mineral treasure.

Oklahoma bids fair to become one of the proudest States in the Union, and should be admitted immediately in every instinct of political honor.

But now comes the bone of conflicting emotion—Arizona and New Mexico.

Opinion, influenced by various interests, is divided into contrary ideas upon both sides of the House.

Some believe that they should not be transformed into statehood under any circumstances, neither singly nor jointly, earnestly contending that they are unfitted at the present time, at least, to become worthy of a place in the Union.

Others think they ought to be admitted separately, warmly advocating that they are each eminently qualified to stand side by side with the greatest of the United States.

And then there are others, it may be, who ostensibly make that argument, but whose predominating motive is to give that part of the country enhanced political advantage through the four Senators the two States would become entitled to upon admission, and the two sets of officers incident to separate statehood.

While the majority believe that neither one of them are now fit alone, and, further, that they have not the natural resources to ever become fit for separate statehood.

But on the other hand, taken together, they may develop enough of the qualifications of statehood in all that vast expanse of territory which is theirs to fairly entitle them to admission.

Your committee believes that, and hence this bill has been reported with such a provision.

Somebody says it is wrong; that the Republican party, through its platforms, has pledged itself to separate statehood for Arizona and New Mexico.

Well, it may be that in some platform of the party sometime in the past, when there was no issue upon the subject and no interest in it anywhere save perhaps in the political mind of a resident of the Territory who happened to know the platform builder at the right moment, it was inadvisedly and indefinitely mentioned in a Republican declaration of things that should happen.

It may have been that such a platform was promulgated without anyone knowing of that particular clause in it, except the industrious person who incited it, and without the voting public in any national election ever having thought of it, favorably or unfavorably.

A glittering nimbus of silver haze, under just such circumstances as I have mentioned, insinuated itself into the platforms of both parties more than once in the history of this country, long before gold and silver became an issue upon which the people actually voted and the parties really pledged themselves.

Yet who would be rash enough to say that we should change our standard now, because somebody we don't know talked loosely or foolishly about it in a convention years ago.

Who will dare to tell me, acting upon my solemn oath to do my duty here and now, that I must forswear my word to keep faith with an inadvertent statement, launched without reason into a sea of mist, and which never reached any port of political consideration.

But, after all, we are carrying out the substance of what ever was said in those days by these political promoters.

Suppose they did declare that these Territories should be converted into States. In no platform did they ever say just how. That was left for time to solve, for legislators to unravel.

In the light of six years of most careful investigation and the experience we have had in Nevada and some other States whose history is somewhat analogous to the situation presented, we find that Arizona and New Mexico might make one fair State taken together, but that they would utterly fail to fill the niche separate and alone.

Now, if this be true, no matter what has been said or done in the past, I for one refuse to stultify the dawning future with a legacy of folly that has come down to me from the archives of the dead.

Indian Territory and Oklahoma ask to become one State. It is their will and wish.

New Mexico, after years of turmoil, now comes to us in contrite prayer, pleading to be taken back to her first love, Arizona, in the holy wedlock of a reunion.

Arizona would be willing if certain interested parties would keep hands off.

The mine owners, railroads, and other capitalists of Arizona, to avoid State taxation, have been crafty enough to play the rôle of Iago, even to the eternal political undoing of both the Territories.

They don't want statehood at all; they can't use it in their business.

I believe the time has arrived when this question should be settled once and for all; settled without regard to the wiles of grasping capital or the finesse of selfish politicians.

After six years of information upon the subject joint statehood seems to be the only safe and fair solution of the problem.

It is indeed true that these Territories embrace within their bosom the realms of an empire in arid distances.

But land alone can not justify a State; it must be sufficient to support a civilized people in a reasonable relative proportion to other States.

This proposed legislation is no startling and cruel innovation.

Arizona and New Mexico were joined and lived and loved and worked together in peace and harmony from the year 1851 to 1863.

At that time they were divided on account of the distances they had to travel without adequate means of transport, making two governments more convenient, and incidentally giving them two Delegates instead of one, and multiplied United States officers.

Now they are traversed by a score of railroads. Distance has been minimized, and their State government, with a capitol near the center, can be reached much easier by all the inhabitants than in California, Texas, and many other States.

After all, great and vast, however, beyond the ken of men who have never viewed it. And yet only one-fourth as large in actual land capable of supporting homes as the proposed State of Oklahoma. But in all our wanderings and devious travail of hopeful plans we always round up to the inevitable.

They want statehood. The politician wants it for the offices; the speculator for the boom; the surrounding neighbors for the Southwestern Senators they will give, and last of all, the average man, the good-faith resident, wants it for the crown of full American manhood it will place upon his brow. I want it for that reason and that alone, and the only way they can ever have it in justice to 80,000,000 people is by the jointure of this bill. [Great applause.]

[a] Estimated.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to use the rest of his time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. How much time is there remaining?

Mr. HAMILTON. I have remaining twenty-six minutes, as I have it, and I think the gentleman from Tennessee has forty-one minutes to his credit, or something like that.

Mr. MANN. That makes more time than you have between you if debate is to close at 3 o'clock.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, so many questions have been presented in the discussion of this bill that it is impossible for one to review all the collateral issues which some gentlemen seem to be of opinion are pertinent in the determination of the main question now before the House for its consideration. I was much interested in the splendid presentation on the part of the majority by the gentleman from Michigan. His speech in some respects was ornate; in others it was semi-classical. All the way through it was semitruthful because of the poetic license he assumed in delivering it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, a proper approach to the first question under consideration, in my judgment, involves the consideration of the constitutional or legal questions that are presented at the very threshold of this inquiry for the determination of the House, and next the moral considerations that ought to influence the conscience and judgment of the representatives of the people. Next, those local conditions or economic questions that ought to appeal to the sense of propriety and good judgment of the House. I can not fully discuss all of these questions.

I repudiate, sir, the suggestion that this is merely a partisan contest, though gentlemen may have risen upon the floor of this House and elsewhere and declared that it was only a partisan controversy, that States had always been admitted as a matter of partisanship. Political the question may be in one sense, but partisan it never ought to be. I will not believe a gentleman who makes the statement that he casts his vote from purely party motives upon this floor on so great a question as this, because to believe him sincere would forfeit respect for his personal integrity and establish his unfitness to represent a great people in the consideration of a great national question. [Applause.] I decline, therefore, to discuss the purely partisan features of a bill that involves the rights, principles, and privileges of 2,000,000 of American citizens. If we have authority to act, that authority comes to us delegated through the Constitution of the Republic. We are clothed with the right and power to erect new commonwealths and place them in the Union upon the same footing as the old States, by the terms of the Constitution. That same Constitution prohibits the division of the Territory of any State in the Union without its consent. Is it an idle ceremony when any Territory of the United States is organized into a government for local purposes? It is then that it assumes a constitutional and legal status. If gentlemen proposed to unite the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona against their will, they ought to have done it before constitutional rights for those Territories attached. It is true that a Territory can not come into the Union of its own accord. It must receive the invitation of Congress. That must be extended, under the Constitution, when the Territory is fit for admission.

When is a Territory fit for admission? That is not an open question in this Republic. It has long since been determined by judicial decision that when an organized Territory is sufficient in area, sufficient in population, and sufficient in resources it is entitled to take its place among the sisterhood of States in the discretion of Congress. The power of Congress then is a discretionary one, legislative and not arbitrary in its character, to be exercised when this condition arrives. What, then, is the legal status of a Territory occupying this position? In the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, when a Territory is organized and the Constitution extended to it by Congress it is clothed forever (and necessarily within its boundaries) with the inchoate right of ultimate statehood. Can Congress deprive a Territory of a constitutional right? If States can not be divided under the Constitution without their consent, or increased in area, can a Territory, once clothed by the extension of the Constitution with inchoate right of statehood, be denied that right without its consent? Is it not protected within its boundaries in its constitutional guaranties? Is not the right to statehood guaranteed when it possesses the qualifications for admission in the discretion of Congress? Congress may delay the exercise of this right—it can not destroy it. If so, the extension of constitutional rights to the Territories by the solemn act of Congress is a mockery.

But assuming, in the exercise of the legislative power of this body, that you have the right to force the union of the Territories, are there no moral considerations that would preclude it? Will you set aside the long-established policy of the Republic? Will you make a new example? Will you unite people different in customs, laws, and religion? Not, I hope, in the interest of a party merely.

Let no man be deceived as to where the issue in this controversy rests. It is not merely a Republican party policy; it is the policy of that great and powerful East (a sectional policy), which proposes, with her grasp upon the Republic, never to yield it, whatever the population of the West may be. [Applause.] Ah, men of the West, the day shall come when those of you who have been charged upon this floor and in the lobby as being traitors to your party will be thrice honored, for honest history will declare that the men who support this bill are the real traitors to liberty, to the Constitution, and the sacred rights of an inchoate Commonwealth. [Applause.]

What are our moral obligations as to Arizona? Arizona has the plighted faith of the Republic, by the Congress, that no part of her territory shall be taken or united to another without her consent. This is not a legal obligation, but it is a moral obligation that ought to appeal to the sense of honor and integrity of every patriot on the floor of the House of Representatives.

Are her resources sufficient to sustain a State? Look at the proofs. I will not enumerate the facts. They appear in the appendix of the report to the House. If there be a man upon this floor who denies that that great Territory is possessed of the resources that constitute a State, let him rise and make the denial.

Has she the population? I answer that we can only look to the population of other Commonwealths when admitted into the Union to determine by comparison the rights of admission in the discretion of Congress of this Territory.

She has more population than twenty Commonwealths that constitute a part of the Union to-day had when they were admitted into the Union. Has she the area? Yes; she has a vast and majestic domain. Shall she be coerced? Shall the Constitution be trampled down by the advocates of the sectional question upon this floor? Shall the policy of this Government be reversed? I have never believed, sir, that the Territories of Oklahoma and Indian Territory ought to be united. They are each entitled to statehood. The only reason I would concede for a moment the union of these two Territories is that it appears to be the desire and consent of those people. Yielding my own judgment to the will of the people of these great Territories,

I would vote to unite them in one if they desired it; but so long as Arizona protests in the name of the Constitution she has supported and the flag she has defended, so long will I protest as a Representative against the unmerciful coercion of that Territory into an unhallowed union with New Mexico. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is a question of the consent of the governed. Who says that there is any reason for the union of these Territories? What imbecility presents itself here when any gentleman says that because some railroad in the Territory is not properly taxed that therefore two great Territories shall be united in order to enforce just taxation? Who was responsible for the law that taxes and fixes that tax upon the Territory—the railroad or the Territory? The Federal Congress, in which their is a Republican majority, determined the question for the Territory. Correct this evil here. You have the full power to reverse this order of things. You can nullify a law of a Territory. But how illogical such an assumption is. If all of that evil exists there, and it were a paramount question in this case—insignificant and immaterial as I insist it is—if it were one of importance, what kind of logic does that man possess who tells us that by bringing together the forces of corruption in the two Territories you weaken the power of the corruption-its? It rather strengthens it. Union is strength and division is weakness. If there be anything in the position, it demands that the Territories shall forever be disunited. Could joint statehood make conditions better than single statehood?

They say that the States will be small in population though great and vast in area. Look at Missouri and other majestic Commonwealths that lie beyond the Mississippi. Behold the great States in the Central West—Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana—and yet when these great political entities were admitted into the Union it was said, by reason of the paucity of their population, that they were unfit for statehood. To-day they are ten times greater in population and more wealthy and powerful than many of the original States. Why should the seat of power in this great Republic remain in the little States of the East and vast Territories in the West be consolidated to maintain it? Why shall they have dominion? Shall Delaware and Rhode Island and Connecticut and Maine and New Hampshire have the power in the Senate that Illinois, Missouri, and Ohio, and other great States have? May I not ask this misleading question, when the advocates of this bill continually suggest that New York and Pennsylvania ought to have more power in the Senate than the new States? Gentlemen misconceive the purpose of the Federal Government who make these suggestions. If not forbidden by the Constitution, would you consolidate the New England States to equalize power between sections or States? The small States and the large ones were each given two Senators for the very purpose of equalizing the power of the States in the Senate of the United States.

It was deemed inimical to liberty to permit the large States on the basis of population to dominate both branches of the law-making power. The Senate does not represent the people; the Senators are the representatives of the sovereignty of the State. The people of the States are represented on the basis of population in the House of Representatives. The truth is that the East does not favor the growing power of the West, and would consolidate the Territories to lessen the number of States and Senators from the West.

Mr. STANLEY. May I interrupt the gentleman with a suggestion?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. Is it not true that it was to protect the small States against the larger population of the large States that that very provision of two Senators was incorporated into the Constitution, and was it not after that provision was put in that the smaller States agreed to come in?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct. But, Mr. Chairman, we have a most anomalous condition here. Arizona does not ask admission. She came to the bar of this House long years ago. She appeared before you clothed in the habiliments of the Federal Constitution. She was as fair as any American maiden whose cheeks were ever kissed by the gentle breezes of a May morning. She asked you to admit her. She said, "I have fulfilled its behests and have a right under the Constitution of the country to come into the sisterhood of States. I am the last born; are you ready to receive me among my sisters?" The Congress said to her, "Though you have the inchoate right of statehood, though you come with the guaranties of the Constitution, yet by that Constitution itself our discretion and judgment must be exercised before you are admitted."

They bid her bide a wee. There she stands, still protected under the same flag and the same Constitution. She asks nothing of you. She abides your judgment. She awaits the hour when in your sound judgment she is entitled to admission under the Constitution, within her borders. Will you let her rest, or will you lay the hands of the despoiler upon her? She is silent before you. Dare you rob her of the robes of the Constitution. Dare you place her back to the earth and commit her to the embrace of the Mexican. Will you despoil Arizona?

In the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] he asked that the star of Arizona be added to the flag of our country. If it shall represent the union of unwilling Territories, call it not Arizona. Let that proud name perish with the rights and privileges denied to her citizenship. Ah, methinks if you fix the star there, cold and inanimate as it may be, it will forever dim the blue of the flag, weeping for her lost civilization. How long shall Congress forget its obedience to the Constitution and its duty to the Republic? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When shall you cease to justify wrong by party necessity? When can you behold with undimmed vision those immortal words that may ever be seen burning in every star on the flag by the eye of the patriot, but never visible to the partisan, words that can not be stricken from it until the end of the Republic has come—the Constitution, the law, liberty, and eternal justice! [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman on the other side remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. HAMILTON. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to use the remainder of his time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman kindly use some of it now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I prefer not now.

Mr. HAMILTON. But we have the closing.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. How many speeches does the gentleman think will be made upon that side?

Mr. HAMILTON. One more speech.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman has only one more speech, then I shall ask the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I wish to have recognized for a moment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this bill, and I will briefly state some of my reasons for so being in favor of its passage. I believe the time has come for completing the Union of the States and doing away with Territorial government within the borders of the United States. Aside from our outlying possessions we now have forty-five sovereign States and these four Territories upon which it is now proposed to confer statehood. I desire to see the Union of States completed by creating what I believe will be two great States in the West—the State of Oklahoma and the State of Arizona—as proposed by this bill. We shall then have forty-seven States in the completed Union, all sovereign, but under one flag, the flag of a great and mighty nation. It is said that we should not join New Mexico and Arizona in one State; that some of the people of Arizona are opposed to such action, and that nothing should be done in opposition to their wishes. Well, there are people in Indian Territory and people in Oklahoma Territory who are opposed to joining those two Territories in one State. Why should not some one rise up and protest against this contemplated outrage? But not a voice is raised against joining Oklahoma and Indian Territory, whether the people or some of the people of those Territories want such action taken or not. Yet either Oklahoma or Indian Territory is much better fitted for and much better entitled to separate statehood than either New Mexico or Arizona. Oklahoma and Indian Territory have each a population, an intelligent, hustling, vigorous American population, of more than three-quarters of a million people, or jointly of more than a million and a half people. With some apparent show of justice they might each claim the right, if there were any such right, to separate statehood. With New Mexico and Arizona it is very different.

Including Indians, Mexicans, and all, New Mexico has only about 200,000 people, and Arizona possibly a hundred and fifty thousand. Neither of them has as many inhabitants as the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent. Yet our Democratic friends would give each of them two United States Senators, and a Representative in Congress besides. I, for one, protest against giving them any such advantage over the people I represent. Both political parties have declared in favor of admitting these Territories to the Union as States. Both parties have made it a political question. It is idle to say it is not a political question. The only difference between the parties is as to how they should be admitted. The Democratic party has declared in its national platform in favor of their admission as States, but as separate States, at least so far as Arizona and New Mexico are concerned. The Republican party, by its action in Congress, in caucus, and conference, has declared in favor of the admission of all these Territories as provided in this bill. If I did not believe the Republican position was the right position, the only reasonable and justifiable position, which I do, I should yet hesitate long before I would take the responsibility of setting up my individual judgment against that of my party, and deliberately bolt my own party caucus and render aid and comfort to the common enemy by voting with the Democratic party—the solid Democratic party—in this House. Why, Mr. Chairman, the fact that the Democratic national convention declared for separate statehood for New Mexico and Arizona is proof conclusive that separate statehood ought not to be granted them, for the Democratic party can always be trusted to do the wrong thing and take the wrong side of all great questions. I represent upon this floor a great Republican district—one of the greatest in the United States—a district that gave President Roosevelt a majority in the last election of more than 25,000 votes. Those same voters, when they sent me here, did not expect me to be a free lance; did not expect me to bolt the action of a Republican caucus; did not expect me to set up my individual judgment against the decrees of my party; did not expect me to refuse to aid in carrying out the policies of our great Republican leader, Theodore Roosevelt. But they did expect me, and they had the right to expect me, to support the Republican President and to stand for whatever the majority of the Republicans decreed to be for the best interest of the party and of the nation, for one is synonymous with the other.

It has been said here, and it is true, that this Government of ours is a government by party. By organization and concerted action alone can any party hope to accomplish results. We are all sent here by the votes of our party to carry out the principles and decrees of the party whose representatives we are. No man is better than his party, and when he gets the idea that he is, then it is time for his party to retire him. Our whole Government is based on the idea of majority rule expressed through political parties. When the members of the party meet in caucus, or primary, or convention, or conference, and its members or delegates or representatives decide by majority vote, then that is the law of the party and every man claiming membership in that party is bound thereby. That is one thing I admire about the Democratic party. Always, whether in the majority or the minority, they stand and do battle as a compact mass, a well-drilled army. Time and again, in perfect unison, we have heard from the other side of this Chamber, during this debate, the assertion that this is not a political or a partisan question. Wait until the final vote is taken, and like a well-drilled and seasoned army, with one accord, every man of them will vote against this bill. They invite Republicans to vote for a plank of their political platform, and I regret to say some, in a spirit of what they think is independence, will do so. I do not believe in that kind of republicanism. I think my party is right on this question. If I did not think so, I should fear that possibly I was wrong and that, after all, it was just possible that the combined wisdom of the Republican party was more apt to be right than my own individual judgment.

The Republican majority declared for this bill in the Fifty-eighth Congress; they have again declared for it in this Congress. Our great President, nearer to the hearts of the people of this country than any other man who ever lived, has, in his message to this Congress, declared for this bill in the following words:

> I recommend that Indian Territory and Oklahoma be admitted as one State and that New Mexico and Arizona be admitted as one State. There is no obligation upon us to treat territorial subdivisions, which are matters of convenience only, as binding us on the question of admission to statehood. Nothing has taken up more time in the Congress during the past few years than the question as to the statehood to be granted to the four Territories above mentioned, and after careful consideration of all that has been developed in the discussions of the question I recommend that they be immediately admitted as two States. There is no justification for further delay; and the advisability of making the four Territories into two States has been clearly established.

I am the keeper of no other man's conscience, but I, for one, am willing to follow the President and cast my vote in accordance with his recommendation; I for one am willing to follow in the path marked out by the leaders of the Republican party and sanctioned in caucus by an overwhelming majority of my party as represented in this House; I, for one, decline to follow the leader of the Democratic minority in this House, much as I admire him as a man, and much as I respect him for his political astuteness; I, for one, decline to shape my political course by the declarations of Democratic platforms. In casting my vote upon this bill I decline to be guided only by what is claimed to be the wishes of the people, or a part of the people, of Arizona Territory. There are more than 80,000,000 people in this country who are interested in this question as well as the 150,000 people of Arizona. It is said that the people of Arizona and New Mexico are so different that they can not get along together. I doubt that statement. If it were true, I should doubt their getting along well with the other States in this Union. Again, Mr. Chairman, it should be remembered that even after the passage of this bill, unless a majority of the people vote to adopt a constitution and thus accept the privilege of statehood which this bill offers, there will be no statehood. Nothing will be forced upon them unless the people—a majority of them—accept the benefits offered them by this bill. I have no fears but that they will accept. The terms we offer them are too liberal to be refused. We give them sovereign statehood. We admit them—350,000 people only—to full statehood; to an equality in the Senate of the United States with the 8,000,000 people of the State of New York, with the 5,000,000 people of my own State of Illinois. They will accept the offer, and I hope and believe that the new State of Arizona will become a great and prosperous State of this Union. Oklahoma will at once assume that position. No one doubts that. It is a great Territory with a great people, and it will be at once a great State. I hope no Republican, in his spirit of independence, or with his "better than his party" notions, will vote to longer keep them out of the Union and under a Territorial form of government. And Arizona, the land of eternal sunshine, whose pure air brings health to all, whose mountains yield untold wealth, whose natural beauty and scenic effects will for all time command the admiration of all who visit its domain; Arizona, with its Grand Canyon, not one of the Seven Wonders of the World, but the wonder of the world, so grand, so awe inspiring, so terrible in its wondrous extent and magnificent beauty that tongue of man never has and never can describe it. This great domain by this bill is granted sovereign statehood in this glorious Union of States, an honor never again to be granted to any Territory or any land, the last link in the indissoluble chain completing the great United States of America.

Fifty years ago New Mexico, of which the present Territory of Arizona was then a part, was clamoring for statehood. It should never have been divided. Its soil and climate and resources are identical. The natural union of the two will, by this bill, be again effected, but instead of Arizona being a part of the Territory of New Mexico the Territory of New Mexico will become a part of the State of Arizona. Magnificent as will be the domain of the new State, it will still be smaller by more than 25,000 square miles than the State of Texas. It has numerous lines of railroad, and means of communication will be comparatively easy and quick for so sparsely settled a region. Its future development and greatness none can with accuracy predict. But its resources are great, its population energetic and ambitious, and under sovereign statehood I predict for it a glorious future. Republicans need not hestitate to vote for this bill; it is in the interest of the people of those Territories and of the people of the rest of the Union. Time has often demonstrated the wisdom of the Republican party on many great questions. It will demonstrate again its wisdom in this. The greatness of the Republican party rests upon the fact that it has always been the party that did things; the party that has never been afraid to meet conditions as they arise, to assume every necessary responsibility, in spite of doubts and warnings and the fears of the weak and timid. The day this bill receives the signature of the President and becomes a law will mark a new milestone in the glorious history of this great party, for all our territory between the oceans will be upon an equal footing, united in forty-seven American commonwealths, each sovereign, and all under one flag, whose forty-seven stars shall be as fixed and permanent as the stars that shine in the firmanent above.

Let us pass this bill; pass it because it is right; pass it because of the greatest good to the greatest number; pass it as a Republican measure by Republican votes. The responsibility is ours; the credit will also be ours, and when the history of the great party is written this action will mark one of its bright pages that citizens of the future great State of Arizona will turn to with pride and thankfulness.

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the rule and shall vote for the bill. In determining my course I permitted the more important questions involved in the statehood proposition to overcome my objections to what must be regarded, in comparison with the main issue, as a minor detail. But I would be unfaithful to my convictions and unmindful of the principles I have cherished all my life if I failed to enter my emphatic protest against the provision which puts Indian Territory under the ban of prohibition. To my mind prohibition is slavery. It is subversive of recognized individual rights, and therefore undemocratic and un-American. Indeed, the question may be fairly asked, Which is the more objectionable, an arrangement which places a man's person under another man's control, or a device by which the exercise of inalienable individual rights is prevented by State authority? The right to eat and drink what you please is not one of those natural rights which the individual is called upon to surrender on becoming a member of civilized society, because its exercise involves neither a moral wrong nor an injury to his neighbor, and this is the reason why those who are ever bent on interfering with the personal habits of their neighbors have never dared to advocate laws prohibiting these habits directly or to deny their rightful exercise. They try to accomplish their purpose by indirection. Therefore prohibition means nothing more and nothing less than to prevent citizens from exercising a privilege which in itself is both legal and moral, and must hence be regarded as an undeniable and inalienable human right. I hold this to be a violation of every sound American doctrine of government and am certain that this House or Congress would never sanction it as an independent proposition.

It is needless to repeat here that prohibition never prohibits. Wherever it has been tried practical experience has demonstrated it to be a lamentable failure. It is because you can not correct human habits and change human nature by legislation, because you can not by invoking the physical power of the State do what education and refinement alone can accomplish. Take the Indian Territory for an example. The excesses committed there, so far as they are traceable to the excessive use of intoxicants, were a direct result of prohibition, which renders the use of the light and healthful beverages, such as wine and beer, impossible and induces people clandestinely to procure the strong drinks that can easily be concealed. This is the case wherever prohibition is in vogue. It proves conclusively that prohibition does not mean temperance, that instead of promoting the cause of temperance it invites and encourages intemperance and excesses. I believe in temperance, Mr. Chairman, and those who have known me here for thirteen years know that I live up to that belief. Moreover, I sympathize with any movement which has the promotion of temperate habits for its object and with all good people who honestly strive to uphold the cause of moderation. But prohibition and prohibitionists do not belong in that category. They may mean well, but the movement long ago proved abortive and the people engaged in it are misled. Their remedy is wrong and vicious in principle and has proved ineffective in practice.

In the short time allotted to me it is impossible to go more fully into this subject, but let me say just a word in regard to the pending bill. If the provision to which I have called attention became a law, the white citizens of Indian Territory, as well as the Indians, would for the next twenty-one years be denied the opportunity of securing even the lightest kind of beverage for their family tables. Their personal rights would be curtailed to this intolerable extent by a mandate of Congress. Is there a single man within the sound of my voice who does not see the absurdity of such a proposition? While granting them the independence and sovereignty of statehood with one hand, are we not putting the chains of slavery around their necks with the other? Is this not erecting the gallows alongside of the liberty we feign to grant them? Surely it would be a repetition of the amusing demonstration in 1848 of which history tells us, when the unsophisticated peasant subjects of the Grand Duke of Hesse shouted: "Long live the Republic! Long live the Grand Duke!" in the same breath. If the good people of Indian Territory should not rebel against this tyrannical attempt on the part of Congress to dictate to them in a matter which is and should be their own affair, then I am greatly mistaken in their character and manhood. It was Abraham Lincoln who said, "You can not create a State half slave and half free," and if ever an American Congress or the people themselves should so far forget American traditions as to ignore the injunction handed down to us in these truthful words, then the Supreme Court of the United States will no doubt give them renewed force and effect. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee now use the remainder of his time?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I believe we have twelve minutes remaining. I desire to yield two minutes of that time to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I intrude myself on the committee only for a few moments for the purpose of denying a statement that has been suggested more than once on this floor, circulated through the press of this country, charging that railroad and mining influences were here attempting to corrupt the legislation of Congress in the defeat of this measure. I want to say once for all, emanating from where it pleases, that whoever suggested it is either ignorant of the facts and ought not to make that statement, or else knowing the facts he falsifies them. [Applause.] It is true, as I have said before, that the railroads in the West are exactly like the railroads in the East, that the mines in the West pay as much as the mines in the East in taxation, and none pay enough, but this argument has been used to scare Members on this floor. I have seen letters myself, and read them, where it was charged that a man voting against this measure would rest under the suspicion of having been bribed by somebody. There has not been one cent or one dollar used; and if this is pressed further, and I can get a resolution passed, I shall have the very last particle of it investigated by this House, if my friends on the Republican side will stay by me on that proposition. It is unfair to the men who appeared before that committee, as fine a body of men as ever appeared before a committee of Congress. Every man paid his own expenses, and they came as citizens protesting against this measure. They were willing to pay and did pay their own way; and I want once for all to give that report this emphatic denial that the man who repeats it, at least after this statement, should know forever that he repeats an absolute falsehood. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill provides statehood for four Territories. It unites into one State the Territories of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, and to this, so far as I have information, there is not a dissenting voice on this floor. Every Member of this body, as far as I know, if he had an opportunity to vote would take pleasure in voting for the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territory as one State. As far as I am personally concerned, and I think that is the view usually of this side, we would prefer that those two Territories be admitted as two States, but, as has been explained, these people are now willing to take joint statehood rather than no statehood at all. If there ever was a Territory that was entitled of its own right to admission, that Territory is Oklahoma, and this Congress, if it fails to give it statehood, will commit a crime against the people of that great Territory. But another proposition is found in the latter part of this bill which unites in one State Arizona and New Mexico, and to that proposition a very large majority on the floor of this House, if they had the opportunity to vote their own convictions to-day, would vote "No." In this connection I am constrained to call attention to that which has been discussed by various individuals on the floor as to who is responsible for existing conditions.

It has been charged that this is the policy of the President, and it has been intimated by Members who are insisting upon supporting this bill that they do it because it is an Administration measure. I wish to call attention now to an article which was written for last Sunday's Star by the well-known writer, Mr. William E. Curtis, in which he gives the views of the President on this particular matter:

> While the President has taken an active part in the joint statehood bill, he is not much concerned personally as to its fate. He regards it as a political measure proposed by Republican committees and indorsed by a Republican caucus, and for that reason he wants it to pass. He does not believe that either Arizona or New Mexico is fit for admission into the Union, and he does not think either will be for a quarter of a century. He fears, however, that the Democrats may get control of Congress and admit them separately, which will make two more "rotten boroughs" and four more "sage-brush" Senators. Therefore he thinks it good policy for the Republicans to admit the two Territories as one State, on the theory that one "rotten borough" is better than two and that two "sage-brush" Senators are better than four.

You will observe from this that the President of the United States, if Mr. Curtis is correct, is acting at the suggestion of the committees of this House and the caucus of the party, which is doubtless brought about by the same committees. The responsibility for this legislation rests upon the committees of this House and the Senate, and the individual on the committee who disclaims, privately or publicly, that he is not responsible, and undertakes to hide behind the statement that it is an Administration measure, seems to be deceiving himself and the public. We have heard a good deal said about New York and Illinois—two wonderful States. It is said that it is unwise, it is unjust, to admit Arizona and allow it to have two Senators, or to admit New Mexico and allow it to have two Senators, who will have as much representation at the other end of this Capitol as the State of New York. What does that mean? That means that population ought to control in the selection of United States Senators. If population ought to control in the United States Senate, have you ever thought about what would be the representation there?

Do you know that according to the rule that obtains here, giving every State one Senator, you would have twenty-two States of the forty-five with one Senator? You would have seven States with two Senators; you would have five States with three Senators; and the chairman of this committee and myself are fortunately living in States that would be increased in membership in the Senate if that rule should be followed. But in the State of Illinois and the State of Ohio there would be five. In Pennsylvania there would be seven. In New York there would be eight. Now, have you ever realized about what that would mean? Do you not know that if Illinois had five Senators that one of them would be the distinguished Speaker of this House? If Ohio had five United States Senators, one of them would be the distinguished Representative from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR. If Pennsylvania had seven United States Senators, one of them would be the distinguished Representative from that State, Mr. DALZELL. If New York had eight United States Senators, one of them would be the distinguished Representative from New York, Mr. PAYNE. If Indiana had three Senators, of course the third would be the distinguished whip of this House, Mr. WATSON, and then what would you do for leadership? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Very much has been said about the Territory of Arizona. It has been attempted on the part of those who have addressed this committee to give the impression that Arizona was corrupt; that Arizona failed to assess its property; that Arizona of all the States and Territories of the American Union was most corrupt in the management of its local affairs. But what is the situation? Oh, they say, the railroads have not been assessed sufficiently. Why not? Because of the action of the Congress of the United States. But notwithstanding that action, do you know that Arizona pays more tax per mile for its railroads than does New Mexico or Oklahoma? It is said that the railroads running through those Territories when reaching over into Texas are immediately assessed for a large sum per mile. As soon as they get across into Nevada and California again they are assessed for a large sum per mile. But what is the truth? In the State of Texas the railroads in 1904 paid $110 per mile, and in Arizona $135 per mile.

The State of Illinois, about which we have heard so much in the last few days, with its hundreds of miles of side track and millions invested in terminals, paid only $418 per mile of line, Ohio paid $468, Pennsylvania $482, and New York $581 per mile of line. According to Poor's Railway Manual, 1905, there are 213,828 miles of railway, worth $15,422,873,305. They paid last year $54,325,856 for taxes in the United States, or $254 per mile. It is patent from these statistics that while Arizona may not receive as much taxes from its railroads as it should, it has received, when real value is considered, about as much as is paid in the States of the Union.

The chairman of the committee, in his excellent address yesterday, spoke very disparagingly of the assessment of the mines in Arizona, and quoted extensively from the report of the governor of that Territory to maintain his position. In 1901 the mines were assessed at less than $2,000,000; in 1904 they were assessed at $4,440,000; in 1905, at $5,325,000, and increased by the board of equalization to $14,440,000. Yet it is proposed to join Arizona with New Mexico to remedy the evil, when the report of the governor of New Mexico shows that the Territory has $38,500,000 invested in mines, with an output last year of over $5,000,000, and not one dollar assessed. The reflection on Arizona about its alleged corrupt assessments of mines and property, when compared with other States and Territories, is not well founded. Especially is that true so far as New Mexico is concerned, as the following quotation from the governor's report plainly shows:

> The real value of property in New Mexico is as follows: Railroads, $86,000,000; farm and buildings, $44,000,000; stock, $42,000,000; mines and equipment, $38,000,000; city and town lots and improvements, $30,000,000; business and manufacturing, $50,000,000; personal property, stocks, and bonds, $40,000,000; a total of $330,000,000.
> The assessment, by classes of property, for 1904 was as follows: Real estate, $17,321,795; railroads, $8,511,539; cattle, $5,870,824; sheep and goats, $2,703,644; horses and mules, $1,059,683; personal and other property, $6,268,035.

It may be well to recur to recent legislative history to refresh the memories of gentlemen. In 1902 there was presented to this House what was then known as the "Omnibus bill," which provided for the admission of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico as three separate States. It came to this body with a unanimous report from the Committee on Territories, was considered, without any rule, and was passed without division or roll call. During its consideration, Mr. OVERSTREET, of Indiana, offered an amendment providing for the jointure of Arizona and New Mexico. This amendment was discussed and was defeated by a vote of 103 to 26.

The report of the committee in its conclusion as to the right of Arizona to statehood was summed up as follows:

> The foregoing is merely a summary of the many facts presented to your committee, from which it is concluded that no valid objection to Arizona's admission to statehood now exists. Many of the greatest States of the Union have been admitted with much less population and half the resources that Arizona possesses. Peace and quiet are everywhere supreme. The law is respected and enforced. Life and property are as safe there as in the capital of the nation. The population of Arizona, by every rule of virtue, education, property, patriotism, and industry, fills to the fullest measure every requirement of citizenship.

Then, as to New Mexico, the committee said:

> If population determines her right, then by nearly every precedent heretofore made her claim is established. If area is to be a factor in its determination, then no question can arise as to her right to statehood. If natural resources and material development are to be the criterion of action, then, upon investigation, she can safely rely upon statehood. If education, integrity, and devotion to American institutions make the bulwark that insures recognition, then Congress, in our judgment, should by legal enactment admit her to the sisterhood of States. If patriotism and a burning desire to enjoy the full benefits of citizenship and to control their own domestic affairs should guide the action of Congress, then the bill enabling her to enjoy these rights should be passed at once.

If Arizona and New Mexico were entitled to separate statehood, then why should they be refused that recognition now?

Why should the majority of the committee having statehood bills in charge now say that separately they are not entitled to enjoy the rights and privileges of independent States, and combined are not entitled to it except as a matter of favor? Why should this House reverse itself on its record of 1902?

It is alleged that they have not singly sufficient population; but according to the precedent they have each more population than twenty States had at admission, and can not be denied on that account.

In 1890 Wyoming was admitted when it had a population of 62,555. In the same year Idaho was accepted as a State, with a population of 88,548. In looking over the record of the vote on those enabling acts it is interesting to observe that the following well-known gentlemen voted "aye:" CANNON, DALZELL, GROSVENOR, HITT, LACEY, PAYNE, Henderson, and McKinley.

Arizona had a population, according to census of 1900, of 122,931, and New Mexico, 195,310. If population is to be considered, why deny them separate statehood, when Wyoming and Idaho were admitted with so much less?

To-day an anomalous position is presented. Less than half of the people's Representatives on this floor are seeking to force a union of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, while a large majority are in sentiment against it. Coerced by the leaders of the majority and urged by the Executive, numerous individuals have buried their convictions and answered to the party lash by agreeing to vote for this union. An unusual spectacle of independent manhood was presented yesterday when forty-three Members dared to vote for what they conceived to be right, in opposition to the rule which shut off the right of amendment to the pending bill and precluded the offering of any motion of any kind in regard to it, but required a "yes" or "no" vote on the bill to-day at 3 o'clock.

If the Democratic minority had the opportunity to do so, it would have two votes on the bill. One on that part admitting Oklahoma and Indian Territory, the other on the admission of Arizona and New Mexico. On the first proposition every Democrat would vote "aye."

Then an amendment would be offered to the latter proposition, requiring the consent of each of the Territories to the ratification of the constitution. If this amendment were accepted, the Democrats would vote for the bill.

But, sir, with the bill in its present form we are obliged to vote against it, because of the intense and determined opposition of Arizona to union with New Mexico, and because of what we believe is a prevailing sentiment in New Mexico as well.

I quote here the concluding statements of a very forceful presentation of the views of the people of Arizona in the report of the Territorial governor, Mr. Kibbe:

> For more than forty years citizens of other States have migrated to Arizona, attracted either by its promise of self-government, its wealth of undeveloped resources, or the salubrity of its climate. They have laboriously built up a Commonwealth, and whether it be great or contemptible, it has their allegiance, their loyalty, and their affection, and in it they have an abounding self-pride. A more patriotic people, a people more intensely American, or more devoted to the great Union than are Arizonians, inhabits no State or Territory within its confines.
> They ask most respectfully, but most earnestly, that no law shall be passed by Congress which shall make Arizona a component part of any State without the consent of her people. Do not force a union upon her.

The solution of the situation is easy, in consonance with every principle of justice. If Arizona possesses the qualities necessary to the establishment and maintenance of a State government, she should be admitted. If she does not, then she should not be admitted, and her right should be held in abeyance until she does acquire them; and the question ought not to be determined by the question of the admission or exclusion of the other Territories, or any of them, any more than in 1850 the admission of California should have been made to depend upon the organization of the Territories of New Mexico and Utah. If, again, it seems to Congress that the welfare of the nation would be better promoted by the jointure of New Mexico and Arizona and the creation of one State out of the two Territories, the simplest and the only just plan is to provide for procuring the assent of the two peoples, if they in fact do assent. If either dissents, no interest of the nation will be jeopardized.

Arizona would be inhabited by a strange people if they did not want statehood, and want it earnestly, and strive for it zealously. If they did not want it then Arizona would not make a good State of the Union. But they want statehood for that Commonwealth which they have built up, in which their hopes are bound. They want it as their reward for their conquest of the desert, their searching of the mountains and disclosing the fabulous wealth of her mines. They want it for the protection and for the fostering of all her varied industries. As all their hopes, their ambition, and their pride are bound up in that State, they insist that they should be its designer and its builder.

A bill similar to the one pending passed the House in the last Congress and was afterwards defeated in conference between the two Houses. In speaking of that action Governor Kibbs says in his official report:

The defeat of the bill enabling New Mexico and Arizona to jointly form a State constitution, and providing for their ultimate admission to the Union as one State, was received by the people of the Territory with universal gratification. The small margin by which the defeat was effected in the Senate and the prompt avowal by the friends and advocates of that measure of their purpose to renew their efforts at the next ensuing session of Congress has, however, excited general alarm.

The proposed union is regarded by our people as a menace to the prosperity and progress of the Territory.

There appeared before the Committee on Territories sixteen as bright and intelligent gentlemen as have appeared before any committee and protested most strongly against the merger of the Territories into one. These came from nearly all the walks of life and represented the people of every locality in the Territory. They declare that not 2 per cent of the people favor the jointure, but that more than 98 per cent are unalterably opposed to the union of Arizona with New Mexico. They desire single statehood for Arizona, but prefer now to be let alone rather than to be joined to New Mexico. They protest in the strongest possible way to the union. The people of Arizona are Caucasian; those of New Mexico are of Mexican ancestry. The people of Arizona speak English; a very large per cent in New Mexico speak Spanish. All business and court proceedings in Arizona are carried on in English, while in New Mexico interpreters are used everywhere. The people of Arizona have the habits and customs of the people of the States, while the inhabitants of New Mexico are largely Mexican in their ideas of life. The people are wholly dissimilar in religion, ancestry, and progress, and are separated by the Continental Divide, an almost impassable barrier.

There are three things to be considered in statehood—the character and ability of the citizenship to maintain a stable government, their application for admission to the sisterhood of States, and the consent of the Congress of the United States.

There can be no question that each of the Territories of Oklahoma, Indian Territory, Arizona, and New Mexico is capable of maintaining a stable government and has a patriotic and progressive citizenship, and by every rule of right and justice is entitled to statehood at once. Nothing would please the people of each more than to accord to them this separate statehood, in my judgment, and wisdom and honor dictates that their wishes should be observed.

Oklahoma and Indian Territory have asked to be admitted together, not because they prefer it, but for the reason that they would rather have joint statehood than no statehood. New Mexico, through her Delegate, asks for statehood alone, and Arizona has presented no request for recognition, but at this time prays to be let alone, so that the request of neither of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico for jointure is asked. Since there is no request from them, Congress ought not in justice to them attempt to coerce their union. No Territory should be forced into the Union of States. The pending bill, if it should become a law, might bring about this state of affairs: Practically every vote in Arizona might be against a constitution, and a sufficient majority be obtained in New Mexico to make a majority of both Territories, and if this should occur under this bill Arizona would then be a part of New Mexico and in the Union against its will and in violation of the spirit of the Constitution and the genius of our institutions.

Such a condition is wrong, as I see it, the pending bill is violative of the teachings of the fathers, is subversive of the doctrine of the rule of the people, and contrary to the principles of ethics by which all men should be controlled. Because this bill is wrong in its provisions and contrary to my conception of the autonomy of States I must vote against it, notwithstanding I am anxious that these Territories shall be States in the Union. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, in closing the discussion upon the Republican side, it is my purpose to appeal, not to the fictions of an hysterical imagination, but to facts, figures, and records; not to party fealty or prejudices, but I would advocate what, in my judgment, is wisest and, under the circumstances, most equitable and just to every section and all the people of this great country of ours; what will best subserve the interests of the grandest, freest Republic upon which the sun ever shone or the world ever knew. I am opposed to every attempt to arouse sectional prejudice in discussing this bill, and can see no reason why anything of a sectional character should be dragged into this debate to coerce or to influence the votes of Members of this House. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BEDE] has referred twice to the Mississippi River as a dividing line, contrasting the States east and west of it. I do not believe in any divisions in this country—by the Mississippi River, by the Rocky Mountains, by the Mason and Dixon line, or by any other line, real or imaginary. We have in the past seen enough of the bitter fruits that have been gathered from sectional prejudice and sectional division.

Whatever may advance the interests or increase the power and wealth of the Pacific coast I would gladly and earnestly advocate and support. I would not oppose the admission of a State into this Union from the southwestern part of our country for any reason that would not be equally potent with me against its admission from my own section of the country. Whatever of progress, whatever of prosperity California and the other States upon the Pacific coast have had in the past or are now enjoying in this era of universal prosperity which rules and blesses our land, have been and are beneficial to us all, for we are so united that we all must to a certain extent share in whatever of weal or woe, good or evil, prosperity or adversity may come to any section of this great Republic. I have heard the term "Pacific coast Senators" used, and the inquiry, "Why are you afraid of Pacific coast Senators?" I have made no statements nor have I heard any from the advocates of this bill that should lead gentlemen to make this inquiry. The term has not been used by me. I believe this broad land of ours is a common country under a common flag, the birthright and home of a patriotic and free people, and that the question to be considered here and now is, What, under all the circumstances, taking the history of these Territories, their progress in the past and their prospects for the future, carefully considering our rights and duties under the Constitution of the United States, both as to them and the nearly eighty millions more that live within our borders, is it proper and just for us to do?

I know something of the people of Arizona and New Mexico; I have spent at least four weeks of my life in those two Territories; I have visited them twice; I know that they have in both Territories good school systems—universities, normal schools, and other institutions of learning; school buildings that will compare favorably with those in my own State and, I believe, with those in any other State. I know that many of their people have emigrated from different States in the Union. I might say that all the States have representatives there. In Arizona the chief justice of the Territory is from my own district; his father was a governor of my State; in Arizona also are two able gentlemen, one a former governor of the Territory and the other a distinguished and able man largely interested in mines and railroads, whose names I need not mention. They emigrated there from my own State years ago. I say I know something of these people. I have been well received by them, have been treated kindly by them, and I do not intend to utter one unkind word with reference to them. But I do believe, and I base that belief upon their history and conditions, upon the census returns and upon personal observation, that, in justice to the other States of this Union, in justice to the 80,000,000 of people outside of these two Territories, you should not make two States of those Territories containing by the last census, including Indians on the reservations, less than 320,000, and containing less than 200,000 to-day, in my deliberate judgment, of Caucasian descent, if you exclude Mexicans, as the people of Spanish descent are called.

Mr. WEBB. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEBB. I will ask you if three and a half years ago, when Mr. Knox, of Massachusetts, was chairman of the Committee on Territories, if you did not sign a unanimous report from that committee, and report a bill to this House in favor of single statehood for Arizona and New Mexico; and, if you did, what has changed your mind on that subject?

Mr. POWERS. I would state in reply to that question, that I do not think I ever saw the report; I was opposed to single statehood in the committee. I was new upon the committee; I had never been in those Territories at that time; I had never investigated the subject very thoroughly, and might possibly have relied too much upon the statements of interested parties as to the limitless future prospects of the Territories.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. POWERS. One at a time. It may have been that as the majority of the Republicans upon that committee desired to introduce the bill that I acquiesced in that measure.

Mr. LLOYD. Were you not on the subcommittee that framed the bill?

Mr. POWERS. I am not aware that I was.

Mr. LLOYD. Do you not remember that you were on the subcommittee and that you suggested a change with reference to the admission of the Indian Territory?

Mr. POWERS. Possibly it may have been so. A subcommittee has principally to do with the details of a bill of this character.

Mr. WEBB. And then became an enthusiastic advocate of the bill?

Mr. POWERS. I never said a word on the floor of this House or elsewhere advocating single statehood.

Mr. WEBB. Now, one more question. I yielded you the same courtesy.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. Did not you lend your influence in favor of single statehood for those Territories?

Mr. POWERS. I did not, sir.

Mr. WEBB. Did you object to it?

Mr. POWERS. I did not say anything about it.

Mr. WEBB. All right, then. That is the way you answer the question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir.

Now, let us look dispassionately at the conditions existing in those two Territories. And in the first place I want to meet in limine the statement that I have heard upon the floor of this House, which was printed near half a dozen times in the report in the Post this morning as to the conditions in the two Territories being so unlike that the people of one had nothing in common with those living in the other; that they were unlike in race, in language, in religion, in laws; so utterly unlike in everything that one gentleman said in opposing this measure since this debate began, it would be miscegenation to unite these two Territories into one State. In the committee I listened to various witnesses produced to show that those conditions were so unlike as to be unbearable. The statement was freely made. I did not hear a scintilla of evidence sustaining the assertions, and it is not in any of the reports. I say to you that the conditions in those two Territories are substantially as much alike as they are in Maine and Massachusetts, and I will prove that statement, too. There was one witness, an attorney, called to prove that the courts' method of procedure and laws were all unlike, and when we asked for a concrete example, and in what the dissimilarity consisted, it turned out that the codes were made from the same sources in both Territories. There was not brought before our committee a single concrete instance showing that conditions were unlike. Let me point out some similarity.

Both Territories were acquired from Mexico; both are arid Territories; both have mines, Arizona has the more; both are grazing countries; both have mixed populations of Mexicans, other Caucasians, and Indians; both Territories were under one government from the earliest settlement in the country down to 1863. There are more people of Mexican or Spanish descent in New Mexico than in Arizona. It has more population, and the ratio is somewhat larger. I will quote some statistics from the recent report of the governor of Arizona. How many Mexicans does the gentleman suppose there are to-day in Arizona? One would naturally infer from the arguments of gentlemen upon the other side that a person of Mexican or Spanish descent was unknown to Arizona, and that there was nothing therein but a type of Caucasian blood much purer than New Mexico could hope to attain to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am unable to state from memory. I have not the figures, but the percentage of Mexicans in Arizona is comparatively insignificant when you contrast them with the number in New Mexico.

Mr. POWERS. I will give the gentleman a statement compiled in 1905, in the report of the governor of Arizona, from which gentlemen opposed to this bill have quoted so liberally. There were in Arizona by the last census, of white persons 92,903. That includes all persons of Mexican and every other Caucasian descent, and excludes Indians on the reservations. When Arizona was organized into a Territory in 1863 there were some seven or eight thousand people there, nearly all Mexicans. Now, here is the language of the governor of Arizonia as to the population now. He says that of those 92,000 people, 38,137 are of foreign parentage, not even born in the Territory. He says of those of foreign parentage, not including the Mexicans born in the Territory, there are of Mexican parentage (born in old Mexico) 14,172, without having any reference to the Mexicans born in Arizona, without any reference to the Mexicans who were there when we acquired the Territory. Gentlemen should remember that Arizona was settled before the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. There are, not taking into consideration these others, between fourteen and fifteen thousand Mexicans there who were born in Mexico. A careful and conservative estimate of the 92,000 people living in Arizona classed as white or Caucasian shows more than 20,000 Mexicans are persons of Mexican descent—more than one-fifth of all. Add to these some 27,000 Indians and you will have some idea of the mixed population over which gentlemen have shed tears because they are to be outraged by a union with New Mexico.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman allow me one more interruption, to read three lines of what Governor Otero says about the difference in these populations, while you are on that line?

Mr. POWERS. On what page?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know what page.

Mr. POWERS. You read that before.

Mr. WEBB. No; I did not read it before.

Mr. POWERS. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me any further. If he did not read it, some other gentleman did.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine declines to yield.

Mr. POWERS. Now, sir, if there is any difference, so far as my observation goes, between the Mexicans in Arizona and the Mexicans in New Mexico, it is in favor of the Mexicans in New Mexico, for a larger percentage of those in Arizona—as that is nearer to old Mexico—have immigrated into that Territory from Mexico recently; so much so that there are between fourteen and fifteen thousand there now out of the 92,000 who are of foreign Mexican parentage.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will pardon me, about 15 per cent of the population are of Mexican birth or descent.

Mr. POWERS. Twenty thousand would be about one-fourth of the population denominated as white.

Mr. SLAYDEN. About 15 or 16 per cent.

Mr. POWERS. More than that—20 per cent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true that, calling as Mexicans those born in the Territory of Mexican parentage and Mexican blood, that the percentage is enormously greater in New Mexico than in Arizona?

Mr. POWERS. The percentage of Indians and Mexicans in Arizona is at least one-third of the population, and the percentage of the same people in New Mexico is less than one-half of the population.

Now, under these circumstances, what becomes of this cry about forcing unwilling portions of the country together, unlike in everything? There isn't a scintilla of evidence for it to stand upon—not one. The gentleman from Wyoming says they had 100 per cent increase in population in those Territories in the last decade. That is not true. The population of Arizona and New Mexico in the last decade increased somewhere from 68,000 to 70,000. The population of both Territories by the census of 1890 was, in round numbers, 242,000; the percentage of increase, some 27 per cent. The census will show it. The percentage throughout the entire country at the same time was a little less. Both Territories were developed very largely during this decade by the opening of mines and the building of railroads. They have to-day in both Territories, counting Indians, Mexicans, negroes, Mongolians, and everything else, according to the last census, 318,000—not one-fifth part of the average number of persons throughout the other States in the Union.

Gentlemen talk about the number of population when other States were admitted. They had splendid prospects; they had vast fertile areas. Down there the governor only claims that about 1 per cent of the land can be reclaimed by irrigation.

Volcanic rocks, cactus deserts, and irreclaimable wastes make the principal part of those Territories.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow me another interruption?

Mr. POWERS. Yes; I have only a short time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman know that Arizona has grown with phenomenal rapidity within the last five or six years?

Mr. POWERS. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman know—as a matter of fact, isn't it public knowledge—that the people who go there to engage in mining and railroad building are Americans—Anglo-Americans?

Mr. POWERS. Yes; many of them—not all, by any means. They are enumerated in the ninety-two thousand. An entirely different rule should be applied to the admission of States under the Constitution from that which governed the formation of the Union by the thirteen original States. Then thirteen distinct sovereignties were forming a general government. Now the General Government, under the Constitution, should admit States only when by so doing it is fair to the people of the whole country. The thirteen original States were separate sovereignties forming a union, and they prescribed in their Constitution that this nation might admit other Territories. I believe that in fairness to other portions of this country it is right, if we are to admit this vast area of cactus and rocks and some fertile valleys and mines—which Senator CLARK says are liable to go out at any time—we should make one State of the three hundred and eighteen thousand. But to make two States of them and give them four Senators would be an injustice to many other States. It would not be an injustice to Wyoming, with 92,000 people; it would not be an injustice to Nevada, if you want to make any more like her, with 42,000 people, having decreased from sixty-six thousand in the last fifteen or twenty years to forty-two thousand, but it would be a crying injustice to the great mass of the people of this country. It would do violence to representative government and would give an unfair preponderance in the Senate of the United States, which is not like the House of Lords, a mere brake upon legislation, but a very potent factor in the legislation of this country.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. POWERS. I have very few moments left.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to ask the gentleman if it isn't true that the State of Maine would be represented in Congress by three Representatives instead of four if it had not been for the Representatives from the Western States on this floor?

Mr. POWERS. The State of Maine has no more Representatives than she is entitled to under the law, and the child isn't born that will ever see in both of these Territories put together a population, to say nothing about everything else that constitutes greatness and worth, that will equal the numbers of population that there are or will be in the State of Maine during its lifetime. [Laughter.]

I have no apology to make, as I said, for this Republican measure. There is not a gentleman supporting this bill who desires to shield himself behind any Executive order or Executive support. This measure is right, it is Republican, it is just, and therefore I expect gentlemen on the other side to oppose it. To do otherwise would falsify the history of their party. The history of our country for the last fifty years shows that the gentlemen on the other side have opposed all of these great measures which have made our country what we now are and under which we have prospered in an unprecedented degree, as no other nation has ever prospered.

Go back for a moment in the history of the country and you will find that persistently and always in your platforms and speeches and by your votes you gentlemen have opposed every important measure. You opposed the issue of the greenback when its issue was to save the life of the nation. You wanted to set the printing presses running when to issue more was to destroy and dishonor the nation.

On this floor thirty years ago I heard your leaders, for you had a majority here then, denounce the resumption act as a wicked act in the interest of the capitalist and bondholder as badly as you denounce this measure, and you passed a bill through this House repealing it. All along the line of march of your party we find monuments erected to abandoned positions. But the Republican party, which has generally guided and governed this great country for a half a century, has made a record that it may well be proud of, and the Republican party to-day desires to do equal and exact justice to all parts of our country. It has never pledged itself in any of its platforms to grant statehood to these Territories separately. It has pledged itself to give the right of statehood to the Territories and have them become States, and is now offering to redeem that promise and pledge, notwithstanding the small amount of population and disparity of numbers, and to make these four Territories into two sovereign States. I trust and hope and believe that action to that end will be taken by this Congress. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate of the pending measure having expired, the committee will rise and report the bill to the House for its consideration.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12707, the time fixed for debate by special order of the House having expired, the committee had instructed him to report the bill back to the House for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 195, nays 150, answered "present" 8, not voting 33, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. CROMER with Mr. PATTERSON of South Carolina.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware with Mr. BELL of Georgia.

Mr. CRUMPACKER with Mr. ZENOR.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. HARDWICK.

For one week:

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. GARBER.

Mr. WADSWORTH with Mr. BOWIE.

For the day:

Mr. PRINCE with Mr. SOUTHALL.

Mr. SLEMP with Mr. LITTLE.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH with Mr. BYRD.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

For the vote:

Mr. HITT with Mr. HILL of Mississippi.

Mr. ANDRUS with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. GRAHAM with Mr. VAN DUZER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RESIGNATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 24, 1906.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: I have this day transmitted to the governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia my resignation as a Member of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-ninth Congress for the Fifth district of Virginia, to take effect January 30, 1906.

Respectfully, yours, CLAUDE A. SWANSON.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 87. Joint resolution to authorize use of transport Sumner to convey members of Santiago Battlefield Commission and others to Cuba and return.

PENSION BILL.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 13103) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes; which was read the first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order on the bill.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF LAWS.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill H. R. 13104 in lieu of the bill (H. R. 9978) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise and amend the tariff laws of the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1905; which was read the first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REORGANIZATION OF CUSTOMS COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 7114) to provide for the consolidation and reorganization of customs collection districts; which was read the first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HOUSE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up as unfinished business of the House resolution No. 182.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it is necessary to make any statement in reference to this resolution. There have been referred to the Committee on Accounts twenty-five separate resolutions. The committee has gone carefully over these various resolutions and has prepared this omnibus resolution, which provides for fourteen janitors to take care of thirty-six rooms. The number of janitors in the last Congress was nine, who took charge of eighteen rooms.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand the resolution is pending before the House now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that it is unfinished business.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it is too late, but at the proper time I wish to ask for a division of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. When it comes to a vote it will be proper.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to get two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes. Does the gentleman want to make a statement now or simply to ask a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you will come over here in the middle of the Hall, so we can hear you, I think we will get through quicker.

Mr. CASSEL. All right. I will try to explain the provisions of the resolution. They are, first, to take care of the janitors of the House; second, to provide a number of additional clerks to the different committees; third, to provide a few assistant clerks, and, fourth, to pay certain obligations to the families of deceased Members. The Committee on Accounts bring the report in this shape in order to facilitate the business of the House and to save time. We have ten resolutions, and I will be glad to answer any question that Members may desire to ask concerning them. If not, I will say the report is printed in full and is before all of the Members.

Mr. CRUMPACKER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]?

Mr. CASSEL. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will be glad if the gentleman will explain the operation of this resolution with respect to the janitors, stating the number we already have, the number the resolution provides for, how they are distributed under the present arrangement, how it is proposed to distribute them, and what, if any, additional expense the additional janitors create. Also, if there is any increase over the expenditure of last year.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, in taking charge of this committee I found there was a great deal of dissatisfaction in reference to the janitor service in the House. Consequently I asked our clerk to secure for me a list of all the committee rooms, those that were supplied with janitors and those that were not, and to ascertain what it would cost to supply all the committee rooms with janitor service. We have provided in this for thirteen janitors for the various committee rooms. But these thirteen janitors are to take charge of thirty-six rooms, being an increase of five over what we have had heretofore, and an increase of expenditure of only $904. This is done by making this janitor service last only during the session of Congress instead of during the whole of the Congress, thus paying them only for the time they are actually in service. We are thereby providing for the care of all the rooms of the House at an additional expense of $904.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will yield me two or three minutes, I will get through with my part of the subject.

Mr. CASSEL. All right. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Five minutes. If that is not enough I will ask for five minutes more.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the other afternoon when I objected to the consideration of this resolution, I had no idea as to what was in it, and nobody, except the five or six gentlemen who are on that committee, had any idea of what was in it. It was more to the way it was being done than to anything else that I objected.

Mr. CASSEL. I want to say for the information of the House, an arrangement was made with the Speaker to make this report and have it published, so that the whole House might understand it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that. I am opposed to the transaction of public business in that way—that is, to bring in an important measure like this—and this bill carries a good deal of appropriation with it—in the shank of the evening, when the vast majority of the Members are out of the House—nearly everybody out that can get out. It is not the proper way in which to transact the public business. Of course, there are a few on each side who hang around until the session closes every day, simply for the purpose of keeping out obnoxious measures. And without undertaking to assume to run things except for myself, I do not propose that any bill that amounts to anything to the country in general shall be passed through this House any more at that time of day, with as few Members as there are on the floor usually at that time. There are certain kinds of bills which we all recognize there is no opposition to when we hear them explained; for instance, bridge bills. I am glad that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has prepared a general bridge bill which will take the nuisance of passing individual bridge bills out of this House. Now, if we could get rid of the private claims business, the war claims business, and the private pension business, then the real business of this country could be expedited very much. [Applause.] Another objection that I had to this bill was that it coupled together twenty-five or thirty different propositions, each one of which may be meritorious in itself; but I am opposed to omnibus bills of every shape and fashion, omnibus bills on statehood, omnibus bills on janitors, omnibus appropriations. The real truth about the appropriation business of this House is that the great evil of the system is in the lump appropriation plan.

I objected to this omnibus resolution the other day peremptorily, and would again under like circumstances. Afterwards it was printed in the RECORD and gave every man a chance to read it. Then members of the committee in whom I have great confidence came to me and stated that it was a unanimous report and that everything in the bill was all right. Now, I have stated my opinion about it; I have stated what I intend to do about that sort of bills, and it helps the other side as much as it does ours. There are no politics in that. There are probably as many men in proportion to the numbers on our side that would ask for the passage of bills like this as there are on that side, except that the Members on that side are a little closer to the machine of the House than Members on this side, and you get a little advantage in the end. But I do not care whether you Republicans do it or whether we Democrats do it, it is a vicious system of conducting public business. My opinion about it is that there ought to be a rule or understanding that when we start in on a debate like the one the other day, on this deficiency appropriation bill, that Members should understand that that is the only thing that is going to be transacted that day. Then we can go down to the Departments and transact necessary business for the people that sent us here or go where we please and transact our business, and no measure of any consequence ought to be called up under the circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Just a minute more. And if two or three Members on that side will join with two or three Members over here we will break up this vicious system of transacting the business of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say this abolishes any of the messengers appointed in this Congress? What are the changes that are provided for in this resolution?

Mr. CASSEL. We have no control over those already appointed.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many of the annual messengers are there?

Mr. CASSEL. I do not know.

Mr. TAWNEY. Thirty-two is the number, if my recollection is right, as I understand it. Now, you propose to add to the annual roll how many session janitors?

Mr. CASSEL. We have fourteen janitors provided for in the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many session janitors have you in addition to the fourteen proposed in this resolution.

Mr. CASSEL. We have no other.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many are on the rolls?

Mr. CASSEL. We have not appointed any session janitors. This covers all the resolutions that were referred to the committee of which we have any knowledge at all at this time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, one question further. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania considered the matter of amending the resolution in respect to the matter of their employment?

Mr. CASSEL. I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 9, after the word "messengers," insert the following: "And in case of failure to perform such duty shall be removed by the Doorkeeper."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASSEL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for the expenditure of a portion of the miscellaneous fund of the House. I have had occasion to complain in times past of the manner in which this fund has been expended. I am chairman of the Committee on the Census, and while the House provides, apparently, for an adequate number of janitors to care for all the committee rooms, the Committee on the Census has been compelled to employ a janitor—to employ another servant or employee of the House to perform the janitor work of that committee and pay the expense itself.

The Committee on the Census feels also that it ought to have a clerk. It is a committee that has considerable important business. It has done considerable business already at this session of Congress and will have considerable more. I believe that the House ought to provide itself, and it ought to provide its committees, with all that is reasonably necessary in order to facilitate the work of the House. I do not believe that any committee of this great House ought to be humiliated by being required to sweep its own floors, to clean its own spittoons—to do its own janitor work, in short.

The legislative appropriation bill carries, I am informed, about $25,000 for the contingent use of the House and $100,000 for the contingent use of the Senate. There is usually contained in the general deficiency bill about $15,000 in addition for the purposes of the House and about $40,000 in addition for the uses of the Senate. The Senate, composed of ninety members, expends three or four times as much for miscellaneous purposes as does the House, with its 390 Members; and the Committee on Appropriations in the last legislative bill undertook to limit and control the expenditure of this contingent fund—the fund that might properly be termed "pin money" of the House, this fund that ought to be absolutely and completely under the control of the House, in order that it might carry on its functions independently—undertook to control this appropriation by imposing some limitations upon it providing that it could not be used for the purpose of employing special help under circumstances that exist at this time. It imposed that condition also upon the miscellaneous fund of the Senate, but when the bill reached the Senate that body very properly, I think, in recognition of its own independence and dignity, said, "You have no right to say to us what we shall do with our contingent fund. That is a matter of our own, and it is none of your business; but if you desire us to help you tie the hands of your own Members in the expenditure of your own fund, we are perfectly willing," and the limitation was struck out in so far as it applied to the miscellaneous fund of the Senate, but allowed to remain upon the contingent fund of the House; and in order that the House might have any freedom of action at all it became necessary to pass a joint resolution repealing the limitation included in the last legislative appropriation bill upon the miscellaneous fund of the House.

Now, as a member of this honorable and distinguished body I feel a good deal of humiliation because it was thought necessary for the House to go to the Senate and ask that body to assist in tying up the House contingent fund, a fund which is necessary for the preservation of its independence and dignity, in such a manner that it could not expend it without the advice and consent of the Senate. The Committee on Appropriations did that, I think, perhaps inadvertently.

Mr. LITTAUER. Not all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Perhaps I had better qualify that statement. The Committee on Appropriations never does anything inadvertently. But it may be that the Committee on Appropriations was not entirely able to control all the provisions in that bill after it left the House.

Now, I believe the distribution made by this resolution respecting janitor service for the House is a prudent one. I believe that all the committees of the House should be provided with adequate janitor service, not necessarily a janitor for each committee. This resolution provides that one janitor shall serve three or four committees. Heretofore some of us have felt that the large committees, provided as they are with elegant mahogany furniture and velvet carpets, with clerks, janitors, and messengers, and all that sort of thing, have looked upon some of the small committees, when they asked for decent service, as if they suspected them of being looters of the public treasury. We simply want just common, ordinary treatment, and we believe the House ought not to be parsimonious and niggardly in the appropriation and in the expenditure of this purely personal fund that is so necessary to its proper administration and to the maintenance of its dignity and independence. I do not believe in the waste of public money in any particular or in any way. I believe that we ought to appropriate and expend the public money economically under all circumstances and at all times, but we certainly are entitled to enough to conduct the affairs of the House in a decent, dignified, and orderly manner.

Mr. CASSEL. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], a member of the Committee on Accounts, such time as he desires.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the minority on the Committee on Accounts, I desire to say that on the day before yesterday afternoon I was necessarily absent, being in attendance upon a meeting of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, so that I was not present when my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] very properly, in my judgment, desired that these resolutions be passed over. I desire to state, in justice to the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, that the committee had unanimously agreed that when the resolutions should be presented, if there was not a full House, the report should be printed in the RECORD, so that all Members could read it before it was acted upon. Not only that, not only printed in the RECORD of yesterday, but a special report was made on this resolution. This has been done, and every one has had full opportunity to investigate the subject.

Now, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Accounts; a report made upon a number of resolutions that have been introduced by Members of the House and referred to that committee by presenting these subjects in a single resolution. It is not, strictly speaking, an omnibus resolution, as my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] calls it; it is a resolution carrying out the purposes of various resolutions that have been offered separately. It comes before the House in one resolution, because it was more convenient, and could be better stated in one than in all; and, furthermore, it would take up less time of the House in their consideration. There is no purpose to join a good and bad resolution together in order to carry the bad through.

Now, if the gentlemen of the House will examine the report that was published in the RECORD of yesterday they will find that while apparently the number of janitors has increased by two over the number employed during last Congress, making 14 instead of 12, which we had last year, we have increased the number of rooms which they are required to attend to and keep in order from 18 to 36. In other words, we have doubled up the work, so that instead of having 12 janitors for 13 rooms, we have 14 janitors for 36 rooms.

Before we agreed to report this resolution we had the officers of the House, among them the Doorkeeper, under whose management the work of these proposed janitors is to be done, before the committee. I desire to say for that official—having been a member of this committee for ten years—that I have never known him to appear before this committee to ask for any additional service or any additional employee in this House that he has not shown was proper and necessary. I want to say further for the Doorkeeper that he has a number of times discouraged, and expressed his views against, the adoption of resolutions which seemed to be for the employment of unnecessary officials.

The resolutions as they were originally introduced provided for the employment of these janitors for the Fifty-ninth Congress. The committee provided that when Congress adjourns the officials provided for in this resoultion shall no longer draw pay. The number of janitors last year appointed by this House drew pay during the recess of Congress in the Fifty-eighth Congress. That will not be so under these resolutions. This resolution appoints them simply for the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do the janitors continue to draw salary during the recess?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not under this resolution. They did during the last Congress, and they do now, but those appointed under this resolution—these fourteen—will not. I want to say that that was put upon this resolution and insisted upon before some of us would agree to it. The increase in janitor service will amount during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress to $904.

We have been informed by gentlemen who are chairmen of committees to whom these janitors have been assigned, and I know it to be a fact in some cases, that some of them have been compelled to pay for the service of keeping the rooms in order out of their own pockets. For a number of the committee rooms chairmen pay for the services of keeping the rooms in order out of their own pockets.

Now, none of the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber have chairmanships of committees and do not use these rooms, but I take the position, and I think it is the correct one, that gentlemen who have these committee rooms assigned to them and transact the public business, whether it is small or whether it is great, ought not to be required to pay for janitor service out of their own pockets.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Georgia indorse the method of procedure of bringing in ten resolutions, entirely unrelated, in one resolution? I do not mean ten janitors, but ten resolutions, entirely unrelated to each other, in one resolution?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do for this reason: These resolutions all apply to the expenditure of money from the contingent fund, and are really on the same subject. They were resolutions introduced—every one for janitors and clerks and assistant clerks and with reference to the usual amount paid the families of deceased employees and for funeral expenses—and all relate to practically the same subject. I do not for myself see that there is any harm, or that any injury can be done to the public service by having these numerous resolutions, all relating to the same subject, coming from the same committee, all relating to expenditure from the contingent fund, embraced in one resolution. It was thought by the committee that it would be for the convenience of the Members of the House and facilitate the transaction of the public business. I do not see that there is any danger or any harm or anything vicious in the practice in pursuing that course.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that a better practice would be to let every proposition stand on its own merits, instead of adopting a plan of I tickle you, you tickle me?

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say to the gentleman there is no such purpose in this resolution.

Mr. MANN. Well, there may not be such a purpose in this resolution, but this resolution as a precedent won't stand long until there is a resolution naming somebody, as they do here, who shall be employed simply because he is taken in with the rest.

Mr. BARTLETT. No, sir; we do nothing of the kind.

Mr. MANN. I do not say the gentleman does this time. I am talking about the precedent.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman knows as well as anybody in this House that upon the simple demand he can separate every one of these propositions and have a separate vote on them.

Mr. MANN. I have already announced that I would make that demand.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am aware of that fact, so that there is no danger of resolutions being coupled together so as to give either improper strength, and no gentleman can be called upon or expected to vote for all these resolutions in order to pass one or more of them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On page 3, the last resolution, it is provided that the chairmen of certain committees shall appoint clerks. I will read the language. It says: "To be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the usual per diem compensation of $6."

Mr. BARTLETT. That has reference to clerks?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. What I want to know is what is the meaning of this language which immediately follows it: "Which shall in each case equal in the aggregate the amount paid session clerks whose employment is provided for by law." If they are to be paid $6 a day, how is this aggregate to be made to equalize the amount paid some other clerks?

Mr. BARTLETT. They are paid up to the 30th day of June of the fiscal year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it intended that these clerks shall be paid from the 1st of July last?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; the resolution says from the time they are certified by the chairman to have been appointed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why is this language in this resolution? After providing that they shall be paid the usual per diem of $6, then there follows this language:

Which shall in each case equal in the aggregate the amount paid session clerks, whose employment is provided for by law.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is mere surplusage, I think. I do not think it means anything particularly. They will not get over $6 a day under any circumstances.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The language would seem to indicate that it was intended perhaps they should.

Mr. BARTLETT. It does not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then why is the language in there?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that in line 13, page 4, the language seems to indicate that the operation of the resolution is to retroact, and the pay is to begin from the time they enter on the discharge of the duty.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; that is it. They are to be paid from the day they enter into the service, as certified by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. That does not certify the pay shall begin from the enactment of the resolution.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; the pay is to begin from the time their employment is certified by the chairman.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On page 4, with reference to the page for the press gallery, it provides that he shall receive pay for the remainder of the fiscal year. Suppose that we adjourn a couple of months before the fiscal year, why should he be paid to the end of the year?

Mr. BARTLETT. That has been the custom and ruling, I am informed, of the Comptroller of the Treasury, that employees of this sort are paid to the 30th day of June.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They would not be paid that way if we did not provide for it.

Mr. BARTLETT. They have been doing it. This is in the usual form.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why should they do it? Why should not we say until the end of the session?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman can offer that amendment. I have no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] will permit me, I will say that the President of the United States declined an invitation to deliver an address at the University of Missouri on the 6th day of June largely on the theory that we would be here in June.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be very true, and we may be here after the fiscal year for a couple of months. Therefore we would have to bring in some other resolution to pay up this page. It seems to me it ought to read to the end of the session.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman can offer that amendment. That page has been provided for the press gallery for years before I came here, and this resolution but carries out the practice and custom of the House in the past.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, is this subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CURRIER). It is not subject to amendment until the hour controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired, or until he yields the floor.

Mr. GARRETT. Can you state accurately or comparatively how much expense this will add over and above the last Congress?

Mr. BARTLETT. In the matter of janitors it adds $904. In the matter of clerks it adds $1,772. The increase of expenses over and above the Fifty-eighth Congress is something like $2,700.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, I want to ask—I am not very familiar with the report just now—whether this provides clerks for any of those committees which as a matter of fact never do hold a meeting? There are committees in the House which never hold a meeting.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will state to the gentleman, and he will draw his own conclusions whether they do anything or not. There are clerks authorized for the Committees on the Census, Pacific Railroads, Private Land Claims, Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress. Those are committees to which additional clerks are appointed, and we have here provided for assistant clerks for the Committees on the District of Columbia, Enrolled Bills, Indian Affairs, and Pensions.

Mr. GARRETT. Those are all large committees. I will state personally I do not know about the other committees.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have been here for eleven years and I do not know personally what work they do.

Mr. GARRETT. It seems to me while it might not be improper to employ janitors even for those committees that do not meet or do not meet often, because the chairman may transact some committee business—it might not be improper to employ janitors for those; but it does seem to me there ought not to be clerks employed in committees that never meet.

Mr. BARTLETT. We have not given a clerk to any of those committees as far as I am aware. We have only given clerks to those I have read, and an assistant clerk is given to the Pensions Committee. We did that upon the request of the chairman of that committee, whose letter is printed in the RECORD. We gave an assistant clerk to the Committee on Enrolled Bills upon a hearing from the chairman on the necessity for it, and it was clearly demonstrated. We gave an assistant clerk to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I know myself personally, from the statement made by the chairman and those who are familiar with it, that it was very necessary. I want to state to both sides of the House that I know, as far as I am concerned and so far as my friend and colleague on this committee, the gentleman from New York, is concerned, who was at this hearing before this committee, we gave these matters most careful consideration. We desired not to be extravagant with the money of the people devoted to the contingent expenses of this House, but at the same time to endeavor to give a sufficient service to the House and Members of the House and to transact the public business satisfactorily and comfortably.

Now, so far as I am concerned, or my colleague the gentleman from New York upon the committee is concerned, we have no interest in the matter. We simply undertook to give to the Members of the House, the chairmen of these committees, and to these committees sufficient clerical service and sufficient janitor service to transact the business of the House, to take care of the property of the Government in these rooms, and in agreeing on this report we think we have done that which the facts before the committee amply and fully justified us in doing.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is there a clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think not.

Mr. HUGHES rose.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman from Texas asked me whether there was a clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice provided for. I do not find any such clerk in this report. My attention has not been called to it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is none needed, because it never meets and never had a bill before it.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, if the Members of this House will get the report made by the chairman of the committee and look on page 4, they will find a summary which gives an itemized statement of what this resolution provides, and I wish to say that some gentlemen have suggested that these resolutions should be divided. This would probably entail twice the amount that these resolutions call for in the one proposition. The committee took all these resolutions, got them together, considered them carefully, and just allowed what was absolutely necessary to give each committee to take care of them, and while there are fourteen janitors provided here for taking care of thirty-six committee rooms, I do not think a Member of this House will say that is extravagant. At least the Members who seem to be objecting the most to this resolution are the people who have the "pork in the barrel" in their own committee rooms to a very much larger extent than this resolution provides for. And if they are going to do that, I think it would be well to take some of the janitors of these larger committees and reduce them to the "session," instead of making them "annual," as they are at present. Now, the only additional clerk that is provided for in this resolution is that of the Committee on the President and Vice-President. This committee has a very large number of bills before it. They have had a large number of meetings. The clerk of that committee showed me a stack of letters to answer in connection with the new Federal election law. I feel that as this is a unanimous report, after being carefully considered by the Committee on Accounts, there ought to be no further objection to this bill passing in its present form, except the amendments that are suggested by the chairman himself.

On page 4, line 19, the chairman of the committee will ask, where there is a janitor provided for the Committee on the Judiciary, and it reads that it is for the present session, that it will be changed, and this messenger provided for the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress. So the whole matter has been gone over with the closest scrutiny and looked into with an idea of the closest economy possible to avoid the different committees with what they are absolutely entitled to.

Mr. GOULDEN and Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CURRIER). Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASSEL] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN]?

Mr. CASSEL. I do.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add a word or two as a member of the minority of that committee and to say that, after four full sessions of the committee, at which these various matters were fully discussed and, as ably stated by my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], unanimously agreed upon, I hope upon a careful examination of the resolutions they will meet with the approval of every Member of this House. The total increase in the matter of janitors is $904, and the total increase in the matter of clerks is $1,772, carrying with it a total increase over last Congress of $2,676 and within the appropriation for the purposes named.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT]?

Mr. GOULDEN. I do.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to know what change in the conditions justifies this increased appropriation?

Mr. GOULDEN. The conditions were that the chairmen of the various committees that seldom met were paying out of their own pockets for janitors' services in order that the rooms might be kept decent and comfortable. Consequently the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, the work having increased from a thousand or twelve hundred bills annually to over two thousand this year, found the work so largely increased that it was necessary to have additional help. That explains the increase of an assistant clerk recommended in this report.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Did the committee make any investigation as to why certain committees never met at all?

Mr. GOULDEN. No, sir; we were satisfied when we investigated those committees that did meet and asked for anything additional or for a janitor. We had the chairmen of the different committees before us and satisfied ourselves that those that did not meet at all, or seldom, were not entitled to a clerk. The chairman of the committee [Mr. CASSEL], who is noted for the kind and impartial manner in which he presides over its sessions, has fully and satisfactorily explained the reasons for our unanimous action.

The majority members of this committee show the greatest courtesy to the minority, doing nothing without our approval. I therefore trust, Mr. Speaker, that this report will be adopted by the Members of this House, as it is undoubtedly in the interest of decency, in the interest of comfort, and the efficiency of the work of the various committees.

Mr. CASSEL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment to cut out the words "and Labor," in line 10, page 2, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman intend to yield any more time?

Mr. CASSEL. I will perhaps yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to make his objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman offered an amendment, but as his time is not reserved any gentleman can be recognized for the balance of the hour, or recognized in his own time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has just offered an amendment which I did not hear.

Mr. CASSEL. It is that in line 10, page 2, the words "and Labor" be stricken out. This is done at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Labor. And on page 4, line 19, to add the words "sessions of the;" so as to make the line read "to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress," and to make this correspond with the other messengers that have been appointed by the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CASSEL. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman did not reserve his time, and has offered an amendment, and he has no time to yield, unless the gentleman yields the time.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to offer his amendment with the intention that it be considered as pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then that would not take him off the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood him to yield his time.

Mr. CASSEL. I move the previous question on the amendment and resolution to its final passage.

Mr. MANN. Why, I thought the gentleman told me that he would give me some time.

Mr. CASSEL. I will if I can do so without losing my right to demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois require?

Mr. MANN. Just a few minutes.

Mr. CASSEL. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman withholds his demand for the previous question and yields five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the very fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania can make a motion for the previous question on the adoption of this resolution is a reason why it is subject to criticism. Here is a resolution containing ten different propositions combined in one, each probably proper of its class, and possibly all of them expenditures that should be made. But if it should become a practice of the Committee on Accounts, having various resolutions sent to it, to bring them all in in one report and pass upon them all at one time upon a motion of the previous question being made, what chance has the House to determine the desirability of making these employments? What opportunity is here given for the House to judge of the necessity for these employments?

If we adopt such a practice there will be no end of the scandal that will arise in a few years, if it does not arise during this Congress. I hope that the Committee on Accounts, hereafter at least, will feel that it is its duty to bring these resolutions in separately before the House, so that each one can be determined on its merits. Here is a proposition to employ a particular individual. It is run in here with a lot of other resolutions. I do not know who that individual is. It may be perfectly proper to employ him. You do not know who the individual is. There is no method by which you can discuss any particular part of the resolution, because in a moment a motion for the previous question may be made upon the entire resolution.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will say to the gentleman there is just one whose name is mentioned in this resolution, and that is the page to the press gallery. That page is there now, and has been there for a number of years, and if elected by the gentlemen of the press gallery he will be the page for their service.

Mr. MANN. Who is paying him now for that service?

Mr. BARTLETT. He is not being paid.

Mr. MANN. Ah; then by what authority does some boy install himself in the employ of the House and then demand that we shall pay him, and run over the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is not being done.

Mr. MANN. Somebody has made an appointment of a page in the gallery, and then you introduce a resolution which authorizes the employment and payment without a discussion upon the question.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is not my proposition.

Mr. MANN. I know the gentleman from Georgia well enough to know that if he had been framing this matter it would not have been brought in in this form. We would have had an opportunity to pass upon each proposition and to discuss each proposition by itself. I propose at the proper time to ask that the vote shall be taken upon each of these resolutions separately, without regard to how the vote shall be.

Mr. BARTLETT. This page in the press gallery has been employed for a number of years under authority of a similar resolution, and the same man has been there for several Congresses, performing this same duty, and the committee in reporting this resolution has simply been doing something that has been done here for years.

Mr. MANN. I have made no charge against the employee in the press gallery, but I am talking about the principle by which this method is pursued.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was trying to explain to my friend here that in one of these resolutions the employee was named and the reason why it was done. It was because the gentlemen in the press gallery had a meeting and came down and requested that we put in the resolution the name of this gentleman whom they had selected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And who was doing that work.

Mr. BARTLETT. Who was doing that work and has been doing it for several years.

Several MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 10, after the word "Laws," strike out the words "and Labor,"

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire a separate vote upon each of these resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is an amendment to the resolution. The gentleman will not be too late in asking for his separate vote. The gentleman will be recognized for that purpose. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASSEL. I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers another amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 19, after the word "the," strike out the word "present" and insert "sessions of the Fifty-ninth;" so as to read "to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I notice there is one section in the resolution where six months' pay of a deceased employee is proposed to be given to his brother. I should like to know what the circumstances were that induced the committee to report that resolution.

Mr. CASSEL. The brother is the only heir of the deceased employee of the House.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Was he dependent on him?

Mr. CASSEL. It is customary to pass such a resolution, without reference to the question of dependence. It has always been the custom in this House, in case of the death of an employee, to give to his family or the nearest of kin six months' pay and the expenses of the funeral.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman mean it is the custom to give that, regardless of the needs of the next of kin and regardless of how close they are?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes; it is. It has been the custom, and I have made a very careful investigation to determine that fact.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It seems to me it is a very bad precedent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman if he will yield to allow me to offer an amendment to strike out the words "fiscal year," and to insert "session of Congress," at the bottom of page 4 and the top of page 5, so that it will read "present session of Congress" instead of "present fiscal year."

Mr. CASSEL. I have no objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to offer that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 25, and page 5, line 1, after the word "present," strike out "fiscal year" and insert "session of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demands a division of the question. Will the gentleman from Illinois point out the manner in which he desires to have the resolution divided?

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division of the question according to the resolutions, each resolution separately.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois desires a division of the resolutions; so that the question will be upon agreeing to the first resolution, which, if there be no objection, the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairmen of the Committees on (first) Education, (second) Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, (third) Mines and Mining, (fourth) Patents, (fifth) Industrial Arts and Expositions, (sixth) Coinage, Weights, and Measures, (seventh) Railways and Canals, (eighth) Militia, (ninth) Expenditures on Public Buildings, (tenth) Expenditures in the Department of Justice, (eleventh) Expenditures in the Navy Department, (twelfth) Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, and (thirteenth) Pacific Railroads be, and they are hereby, authorized to appoint a janitor to each of said committees to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, whose compensation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $60 per month, and said janitors, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, shall also have the care of the rooms of the following-named committees and offices and shall perform all of the duties required of messengers, and in case of failure to perform such duty shall be removed by the Dookeeper, namely:

First. Revision of the Laws.

Second. Reform of the Civil Service, and the room of the index clerks.

Third. Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, and Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Fourth. Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and Mileage.

Fifth. Manufactures.

Sixth. Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments.

Seventh. Private Land Claims, and Expenditures in the Post-Office Department.

Eighth. Census, and Ventilation and Acoustics.

Ninth. Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, and Immigration and Naturalization.

Tenth. Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

Eleventh. Lieutenants, and guard rooms of the Capitol police and the room formerly used by the Committee on Examination and Disposition of Documents.

Twelfth. Expenditures in the State Department, and Expenditures in the War Department.

Thirteenth. Expenditures in the Interior Department.

The pay of such janitors shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of said chairmen.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to appoint a janitor to perform service in the office of the file, journal, and printing clerks of the House, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $60 per month.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairmen of the following-named committees are hereby authorized to appoint clerks to such committees to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the usual per diem compensation of $6, which shall in each case equal in the aggregate the amount paid session clerks whose employment is provided for by law, namely, Census, Pacific Railroads, Private Land Claims, and Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress: Provided, That the pay of such clerks shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of said committees.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairmen of the following-named committees are hereby authorized to appoint assistant clerks to such committees to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-ninth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the usual per diem compensation of $6, which shall in each case equal in the aggregate the amount paid session clerks whose employment is provided for by law, namely: District of Columbia, Enrolled Bills, Indian Affairs, and Pensions: Provided, That the pay of such clerks shall begin from the time they entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of said committees.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read the next resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CASSEL, a motion to reconsider the several votes whereby the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization be authorized to have such printing done as may be required in the transaction of its business during the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is usual for that committee to have this authority.

Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey. It is.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to hear some reason why this privilege should be extended to the committee. If no explanation is made, Mr. Speaker, I shall object.

Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that it is customary for us to have printing done. We are taking testimony, and it is necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Is this the unanimous report?

Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor be authorized to have printed and bound whatever papers and documents in connection with subjects under consideration by the committee may be necessary to the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to know if this is the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, that is a resolution which has been passed annually for the Committee on Labor for many years—something that is necessary. It is here now instead of on the first day of the session because of my own forgetfulness of my duty on that day. There are few committees of this House having more hearings and more occasion to print than the Committee on Labor.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to know whether the committee has actually considered this resolution and whether the report on it is unanimous?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is not a committee resolution. It is not customary for such resolutions to be considered.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, then, I shall object to it. The gentleman says that it has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I desire to say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that it is entirely outside of the custom for resolutions of this nature to be considered by committees. They are generally submitted by the chairman at the organization of the committees, when unanimous consent is not required, and they go as a matter of course. There is no question about the necessity of it. The Committee on Labor is engaged in a hearing now on the child-labor bill, and it is absolutely necessary that it should have the authority to print.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I believe that a committee ought to consider a resolution and authorize the request. That is what I believe about it, and therefore I shall object.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is because the gentleman does not know; but he has the right to object, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am willing for the gentleman to entertain his opinion on that proposition, and I can draw my own conclusions from statements made on the floor of this House by gentlemen who wish to make them. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

GENERAL BRIDGE BILL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 6009, known as the "general bridge bill," which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6009) to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman what the general tenor of the bill is. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to include in a general law the present provisions which we put in each separate bridge bill which is passed through Congress, making the provisions applicable to all bills which shall hereafter be passed by Congress, so that hereafter, if this bill becomes a law, a bridge bill which comes into Congress will be only a few lines long and will refer to the provisions of this act, saving the time of the House and of the Senate and the time of the committees, and putting in one law a uniform system of provisions concerning bridges which anybody interested may obtain.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do we still have to go through the performance of introducing bills here and passing them?

Mr. MANN. It would still be necessary, if this bill becomes a law, to introduce bridge bills the same as we do now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is to be done with them after they are introduced?

Mr. MANN. We pass them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How do we gain anything then?

Mr. MANN. We gain in this way: When a bridge bill is introduced now the committees and Congress require certain provisions to be inserted in the bill—provisions in reference to the transportation of the mails; provisions in reference to the use of bridges by various railway companies on equal terms; provisions in reference to constructing signals upon the bridges—a great many provisions which we require to be inserted in each bill.

If they are not in the bill as presented to Congress, the committee requires the insertion of the provisions. That compels the committee to scan the terms of each bill when it is introduced. In addition to that we send all of these bills to the War Department, and the War Department scans each of those provisions in the bill. If they are left out of the bill they recommend their insertion. Then it comes in the House and the bill has to be read. The proposition now is to include all the provisions in a general act which shall apply to bridges hereafter authorized by Congress, and after that when a bill is introduced it will be simply a bill authorizing such and such a railroad company or other company to construct a bridge at such and such a point in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, let me inquire, is there anything in the Constitution that prohibits lodging the power in the Secretary of War or somebody else to authorize the building of a bridge, or do we have under the Constitution to go through this everlasting rigamarole in passing bridge bills?

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary at all to do that. Congress could authorize the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers to grant permission to build bridges.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what I thought your bill was going to do.

Mr. MANN. We do that now as to bridges over rivers wholly within one State, but Congress has never thought it desirable to waive the right of control by Congress which exists. I suppose that has largely grown out of bridges across the Mississippi River, as it has never been considered desirable to erect too many bridges across that river on account of navigation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is absolutely true.

Mr. MANN. And that is the reason it has been held, and the committee has not sought to interfere with the jurisdiction of Congress, because that might lead to interminable debate and great variety of opinion, but we think there can be no variety of opinion about the desirability of including all the provisions under a general act and saving the time and attention of Congress and Members of the House. I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the import of this bill to be to require that every bridge bill presented to Congress shall contain these certain provisions.

Mr. MANN. Well, that would be the practical effect, but we put the provisions in the general law and say this, that when hereafter authority is granted by Congress to any persons to construct and maintain a bridge across or over any navigable waters of the United States such bridge shall not be built or commenced until certain things are done, and when constructed they shall be under the operation of the law, so that we do not need to put these provisions in each separate bill, but in the new bill we will refer to this act and say the bridge shall be built in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose some gentleman were to offer in the House of Representatives a bill containing provisions regardless of this act, and suppose the Speaker were to recognize him, and suppose the bill passes, that bill would have the force and efficacy of law notwithstanding this act?

Mr. MANN. Certainly, Congress would still have authority to do what it pleases about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, it seems to me it would be much better——

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he will not speak a little louder?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me it would be much better if you would bring in a bill relegating this entire matter to the War Department under certain legal restrictions.

Mr. MANN. I would say to the gentleman from Mississippi I am inclined to agree with him on that point, but that bill would not pass by unanimous consent in either body.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It might not be passed by unanimous consent, but it could be passed.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not certain even that it can be passed.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not hear all of your statement as to what the object of this bill is. Does it dispense with bills being introduced hereafter when these bridges are to be built?

Mr. MANN. It does not. It does not affect the present law on that subject at all.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why not leave each case to stand on its own merit when it comes up? If a bill must necessarily be introduced hereafter, why not wait until the bill comes up and then determine the questions arising in each bill?

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman if there be any special circumstances requiring a change of the act, Congress reserves that power to make it in a new bill, but, as a matter of fact, we put in all bridge bills various provisions, and, as a rule, they are not introduced in that shape.

It is very seldom that a bridge bill passes through Congress without a large number of amendments reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. We put those provisions in. A Member introduces a bridge bill that is drawn usually by the attorney of some company who is not familiar with the practice, and we have to go through all of that form. There is no object in taking up the time of the committee or of Congress in that way, but if there be any special reason why the form should be changed, why, of course, we can do that when the matter is presented to the committee and to Congress.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have not heard the provisions of the bill, but I caught something that sounded like "work could be begun on the bridge before the matter was submitted to Congress under this bill."

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; work shall not be begun.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. This is a very important question. It involves interstate commerce, and it seems to me that each bill ought to stand on its own merits, and I feel very much like objecting.

Mr. MANN. We passed this bill in the last House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The joint committee have made a unanimous report, but I should certainly like to hear it explained and ascertain exactly what is in the bill before I vote on it. I have not had an opportunity to read it.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that the provisions in the bill are either the provisions of existing law, which are partly codified here, so that they can all be in one act, or else those provisions which we invariably insert in all of the bridge bills.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why not let it go over until next week, so that we can look into it and investigate it? Interstate commerce is a great question, and we are all studying it some now in view of the rate proposition.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that it is a practical question. We passed this bill in the last House. We can not call the bill up every day.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Is not the gentleman willing to let it go over until to-morrow anyhow, so we can look at it?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, of course, can require it to go over indefinitely. I have been trying to bring this bill up ever since Congress met.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not know that I shall object to it, but I would like to understand it. I have great confidence in the report of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I have great consideration for the gentleman's opinion, but the gentleman knows very well that we pass these bridge bills constantly in the afternoons here. No question is raised as to them after they come from the committee. This is as much for saving time to the committee as anything else. I do not know when we will get it up again, as we have a great many bridge bills pending; but the desire is to save the time of the House and the Senate.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have great admiration for the intelligence of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and do not want to object to this bill; but I do want to understand what we are doing. It involves a great question. I would like the gentleman to agree to let it go over until next week some time, so that we can investigate it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has the privilege of objecting; but I have worked so hard on it that I do not want to put it over.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ALIEN LABOR ON ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolution of the House No. 159, have had the same under consideration and respectfully report the following in lieu thereof:

"Resolved, That it shall be in order to offer as an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 12320), either in the House or in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, even although the paragraph to which it is germane may have been passed, the following amendment:

"'The provisions of the act entitled "An act relating to the limitations of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia," approved August 1, 1892, shall not apply to alien laborers employed in the construction of the isthmian canal within the Canal Zone.'"

Mr. DALZELL. On that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to demand the previous question at this time, but permit the House of Representatives to have something to say about the passage of this resolution, and for the purpose of saying a few things myself.

Mr. DALZELL. Why, of course my friend from Mississippi understands that there will be twenty minutes' debate on a side under the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand you have demanded the previous question.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I have; but the rule itself provides twenty minutes' debate on each side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I wanted to argue the previous question before it passed.

Mr. DALZELL. The rule does not permit that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I will ask the gentleman to yield me five, six, or seven minutes on the question as to whether the previous question shall be ordered.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time would the gentleman like to have?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Six or seven minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. We would have twenty minutes on a side under the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to discuss for six or seven minutes whether the House shall call the previous question.

Mr. DALZELL. And to have no debate after the vote?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not want to waive the subsequent debate.

Mr. DALZELL. I can not yield time for that.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House proceeded to divide; and the Speaker announced 116 in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise? The House is dividing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the other side.

The SPEAKER. It does not require the demand for the other side. The House is dividing.

The House proceeded to divide; and the Speaker announced 116 yeas, 93 noes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, there is a quorum present. The ayes are 116, the noes are 93.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the Chair has not——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will halt a moment and see. The gentleman from Mississippi after the vote was taken made the point——

Mr. WILLIAMS. While the Speaker was announcing the vote.

The SPEAKER (continuing). That there was no quorum. The Chair announced that a quorum had voted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair has not announced the result yet.

The SPEAKER (after a pause). The Chair finds on consulting the precedents that the demand is in time. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 96, answered "present" 8, not voting 128, as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

For the session:

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RUPPERT.

Mr. MORRELL with Mr. SULLIVAN of New York.

Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania with Mr. PATTERSON of North Carolina.

Until further notice:

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania with Mr. BROUSSARD.

Mr. CROMER with Mr. PATTERSON of South Carolina.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware with Mr. BELL of Georgia.

Mr. CRUMPACKER with Mr. ZENOR, except on Philippine bill.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. HARDWICK.

Mr. CURTIS with Mr. LITTLE.

Mr. GRAHAM with Mr. VAN DUZER.

Mr. HITT with Mr. HILL of Mississippi.

For one week:

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. GARBER.

Mr. WADSWORTH with Mr. BOWIE.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut with Mr. REID.

For this day:

Mr. WACHTER with Mr. GUDGER.

Mr. LOVERING with Mr. STANLEY.

Mr. KAHN with Mr. LEGARE.

Mr. DOVENER with Mr. LINDSAY.

Mr. GILLETT of California with Mr. MAYNARD.

Mr. OVERSTREET with Mr. WOOD of Missouri.

Mr. OLMSTED with Mr. LAMAR.

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. GAINES of Tennessee.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio with Mr. RAINEY.

Mr. JENKINS with Mr. RANDELL of Texas.

Mr. BEDE with Mr. GILL.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama.

Mr. BARCHFELD with Mr. FINLEY.

Mr. BUCKMAN with Mr. GLASS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE with Mr. PUJO.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH with Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky.

Mr. HOWELL with Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN.

Mr. CASSEL with Mr. GOLDFOGLE.

Mr. DUNWELL with Mr. MCDERMOTT.

Mr. ANDREWS with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. MCCREARY of Pennsylvania with Mr. TALBOTT.

Mr. PRINCE with Mr. SOUTHALL.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH with Mr. BYRD.

Mr. PEARRE with Mr. COCKRAN.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania with Mr. AIKEN.

On this vote:

Mr. FREDERICK LANDIS with Mr. HEARST.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. BURLESON.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I think before saying anything I should like to have the rule read again. A great many gentleman have come in since it was first read and they have not heard it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the rule.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, some days ago when the urgent deficiency bill was under consideration a paragraph was read which provided, in substance, that the eight-hour law should not apply to work on the isthmian canal within the Canal Zone. The point of order was made that that was new legislation, and the point of order was sustained. There is believed to be controlling reasons why the House should now pass upon the subject of the eight-hour law with respect to alien labor on the Isthmus, and for the purpose of bringing the question before the House this rule makes in order as an amendment the paragraph which was stricken out the other day, with an amendment that it shall apply only to alien labor. With that explanation of the rule, I yield so much time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], in charge of the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, as just stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the object and purpose of this rule is to give an opportunity to the House to determine whether to repeal the law limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States in so far as that law is applicable to alien labor in the Canal Zone. It differs from the provision submitted to the House in the urgent deficiency bill in that it exempts the citizens of the United States from the application of the repeal sought for. It is a proposition worthy of consideration from the standpoint of the interests of the United States alone, and without the admixture of political considerations.

All who have considered the problem at Panama have reached the positive conclusion that the great obstacle to the rapid construction of the canal (and rapid construction must be admitted to be of paramount importance) is our inability to secure a sufficient force of unskilled manual laborers of fair efficiency to do the work. We have been compelled, as the French were before us, to draw our labor from the adjacent islands of the West Indies, from Martinique, Santo Domingo, Barbadoes, and Jamaica. This labor is low in efficiency. Indolence is ingrained in these people of the Tropics. They are drawn to the Canal Zone by the opportunity of obtaining there higher wages than they ever before dreamed of, so that in a few days of each week they can earn enough to permit them to loaf around the balance of the week. Of a force of 4,000 laborers at a given point it was found that but 2,500 of them could be counted on for an average day's work. It has been proved that the work of three or four of these aliens is not more than equal to the work of the average day laborer in the United States for the same length of time. The eight-hour law was enacted for the benefit and protection of the American laborer. I know the American laborer to be a patriotic citizen, and when he appreciates——

Mr. McNARY rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. LITTAUER. For a question.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to ask the gentleman whether behind all this idea of doing away with the eight-hour law is not the purpose of employing Chinese cooly labor to build the canal?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Chinese-exclusion act controls that. This amendment has no relation to Chinese labor.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to ask the gentleman if the Chinese-exclusion act applies to the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe it does.

Mr. McNARY. I believe that it does not.

Mr. LITTAUER. I feel confident that when the American laborer appreciates that Americans, because of climatic conditions, can not perform work in the Canal Zone and that only men of the Tropics can do that work he will not desire to hamper this greatest of public undertakings, and will cheerfully approve of the repeal of this eight-hour law in so far as it applies to alien labor necessary to prosecute the work. In no way can this repeal affect American standards, either the standard of the hours of labor or the standard of the wages paid. What good reason can there be to enforce the eight-hour law, believed to be so beneficial to the workman of the United States, when it does not affect any American laborer? Why enforce these laws on those you do not wish to become and will not be American citizens? Why, then, is it not our imperative duty to repeal this law, so as to exempt from its operation the colored alien labor in the Canal Zone, when the chief engineer of the Commission, Mr. Stevens, declares to us that by its repeal he will be enabled to save 20 per cent in the cost of labor in the construction of the canal and in addition thereto hasten the completion of this great work? We have provided for the dictates of humanity most liberally; we offer wages far beyond those that have prevailed in the Tropics.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LITTAUER. I will.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman explain by what process money can be saved by allowing men to work over hours?

Mr. LITTAUER. The character of the labor that we will employ, and must employ as far as we know, on this canal work is the labor of the adjacent islands, as I stated before. That labor has been accustomed to work from sunrise to sunset. The gait at which they work is a sort of easy-going one, accomplishing very little, which permits them to work long hours and accomplish in each hour about the same amount. Now, the chief engineer states to us that this labor ought to work, at the gait it does work, ten hours a day, and that he could get ample supply of these laborers to work ten hours a day for no more than he is paying now for eight hours' work.

Mr. JAMES. I understand they want to pay them by the hour.

Mr. LITTAUER. They will be paid by the hour, and it is necessary to pay them by the hour, because when they have worked about a couple of hours hundreds will sneak off into the jungle and refuse to work longer. Their indolent habits prevent their working continuously.

Mr. JAMES. Then how is it that if you pay them the same price per hour——

Mr. LITTAUER. They will not get the same price per hour.

Mr. JAMES. How much will they get a day?

Mr. LITTAUER. They are getting now 20 to 26 cents an hour, but the price per hour is not dictated by legislation. That is under the control of the Commission.

Mr. JAMES. I understand it is their policy to pay them by the hour.

Mr. LITTAUER. The policy is to pay by the hour.

Mr. JAMES. Then why will not a man get more if he works ten hours than if he works eight hours a day?

Mr. LITTAUER. He will get the stated wage which is fixed by the Commission.

Mr. JAMES. Let me ask the gentleman further, would not this tend to discriminate against American labor?

Mr. LITTAUER. In what way can it discriminate against American labor? Americans can not work there. It is impossible for an American workman to go there and work on account of the climatic conditions. In spite of the fact that we have spent millions on the sanitation of the Zone, Americans can not work there, and this repeal can not affect American labor at all. I feel confident that the American laborer will approve of this repeal when he knows that Americans can not work there. And if the American citizen should go there, the exception under the rule absolves him from this repeal.

Mr. JAMES. Does not the gentleman think that in a climate like that, where Americans can not labor, that eight hours is long enough for anyone to work?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not. They have been accustomed to work for generations from sunrise to sunset.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask two or three questions to clear up this situation.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. LITTAUER. I will for a question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. These men all work by the hour?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are paid by the hour?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; as I have stated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then how does this proposed amendment change the case in any way?

Mr. LITTAUER. It will only cause a change when the Commission determines to pay a less amount per hour.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That will apply to the eight-hour men, too.

Mr. LITTAUER. Apply to the eight-hour men? This can only apply to aliens coming from the Tropics. The eight-hour law will continue to apply to all American citizens in the Canal Zone as well as in the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman this: Does not the price that you have to pay the alien labor fix the price that you have to pay the American labor?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, they are in an entirely different class. One is the common, unskilled manual laborer, an alien, and the other is the skilled mechanic—the engineer—the man who handles the steam shovel, and who is an American citizen.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose eight or ten or fifteen or twenty thousand negroes, or any other number, from the extreme southern parts of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas go down there, is it not highly probable that they can work in the Tropics just as well as these Jamaicans?

Mr. LITTAUER. They are paid better here, in the first place, than they are being paid there, or it is proposed to pay them. Labor is in such demand in the United States that there is no incentive for our laborers to go to Panama. And if they did go there, and they were citizens of the United States, they would come under the eight-hour law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, it has not been ten minutes since the gentleman stated that these fellows got higher wages down there than usual.

Mr. LITTAUER. They receive higher wages than has ever been paid in the Tropics. We pay them 20 cents an hour, and they frequently work for 6 or 8 cents an hour about their homes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When was the Chinese-exclusion act made applicable to the Canal Zone?

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, specifically, I believe it never was. The Canal Zone, I believe, is controlled by the eight-hour law as well as all other laws of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that the Chinese-exclusion act had to be made especially applicable to the Philippine Islands out of extreme caution to keep the Chinese coolies from first going thither and then coming into the United States? I would like an answer to that.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not see where the Chinese-exclusion proposition applies at all to the repeal of this eight-hour law. It seems to me it stands by itself, and while it is an interesting matter, it does not come directly in consideration here now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One more question——

Mr. LITTAUER. I can not answer the gentleman fully, because I am not fully advised.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not the very same force that is back of the repeal of this eight-hour law, as to the aliens, also in favor of the proposition of repealing the Chinese-exclusion law, if it does extend to the Isthmus of Panama—to repeal that clause, so that the Chinese and Japs can come in there and work?

Mr. TAWNEY. One moment, if my colleague will permit. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that the eight-hour law was construed by the Attorney-General to be applicable to the Canal Zone, although there was no legislation on the subject. Upon the same ground the Chinese-exclusion act would no doubt be held to apply.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, no one knows whether the Chinese-exclusion law applies there, because there has been no determination to that effect.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, we have not heard from the other side as yet.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One moment. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] one more question. How does the gentleman come to the conclusion that the Chinese-exclusion act applies to the Isthmus of Panama?

Mr. TAWNEY. Simply because they are excluded. There has been no judicial determination of that question, but the Department of Justice has decided that the eight-hour law applies, and if the question should be presented to the Department it would no doubt and for the same reason be determined as to the Chinese-exclusion act as it has been determined as to the eight-hour law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] whether he would please make his speech in his own time and not in mine.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would ask the gentleman from Minnesota how he knows that?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; the gentleman does not know any more about it than I do.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, either the eight-hour law, now on the statute books, is a sensible thing or it is a nonsensical thing. If it be a sensible thing in the Temperate Zone, where men can work long hours, then it is a still more sensible thing in the Tropics, where they can not work long hours. Now, either the Republican party, of which the Speaker is the distinguished chief—outside of the White House [applause]—is guilty of hypocritical pretense or it is not. It has vaunted itself before this country as the party that believed in subordinating our entire fiscal system to maintaining what they call "an American standard of hours and of wages," and yet at the very first opportunity that presents itself the Republican party, represented by the Speaker and the Committee on Rules—the other two members of that committee being, perhaps, the ablest men and most typical Republicans in this House—bring in a rule to do what? To let the United States, as an employer of labor, set the example of defying and dispensing with their own law of hours as applied to labor! The gentleman tells me that this act applies to nothing but "alien labor." That is not true. In words this act applies to nothing but alien labor, but the American laborer, whether the Mississippi darky or the Pennsylvania white man, who will be down there upon the Isthmus working will be brought into contradistinction with the aliens who are working more than eight hours, and if the same idea that is instigating you to pass this resolution will then instigate the managers of labor upon that Isthmus, they will very soon tell the Mississippi darky or the Pennsylvania white man that if he does not work longer than eight hours he is persona non grata with his employer, and he can go back where he came from.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to call attention to the testimony before the Committee on Appropriations, in order to show that not only the common laborers are paid by the hour, but the mechanics and the machinists are also paid by the hour?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true. Attention has already been called to that fact by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and I thought it was clear enough. I said some time ago that the time would come when one more drop would overflow the cup of your insolence and your triumph. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This is about the drop that will do it. You talk about being peculiarly the party representing American labor within the American Union. I notice you always represent it in such a manner as that the American capitalist may collect the returns, and whenever there is a chance for you to stab American labor under the fifth rib you stab it, and this is one of the chances you have had lately, and you are stabbing now. Either the eight-hour law is right or it is wrong; either it is wise or it is unwise; either it is patriotic or it is unpatriotic. If it be wise and patriotic and right, you have no cause under the sun to dispense with it upon the Isthmus of Panama. You tell me that it is because those people down there work indolently. Why do they work indolently? Because they have been slaves all their lives, and working from sunup to sunset. No man can work in industrial activity energetically from sunup to sunset, and yet you want to perpetuate that kind of condition.

Mr. Speaker, this is an opportunity, the gentleman from New York said, for the House to dispense with a rule. I wish to heavens the gentleman from New York had mastered that principle long before to-day. Up to this good time he has not been encouraging the House to dispense with rules. He has not been even encouraging the House to dispense with special reports from the Committee on Rules, as we witnessed yesterday in the statehood case. You would not yesterday give the House the right to handle itself, to vote for itself, on the great question of admitting a State into the Federal Union, and now you want to dispense with a rule in order to give the House an opportunity to stab to death the eight-hour law that you put on the statute books, and that you put there rightly and properly. You have got to face this question outside of this House before the American people, and the confinement in hæc verba of this rule to alien labor will not help you at all, because the American laborer will understand the proposition. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hate to talk about myself, because when I view all the great world of revolving planets and all the multitude of men around me on this planet I know that one man is not worth talking about, but I will say I am not a demagogue. I would not advocate anything in the world because organized labor wanted it if it was wrong, and I would not refuse anything in the world because organized labor does not want it if it is right——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And this law proposed to be dispensed with is right. It is right that men should have their time divided into three equal parts, so that there may be some of their time left to get rid of the miserable, paralyzing habit of adding one dollar to another——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask just one question? Allow me to ask the gentleman if the gentleman has not given the Republican party credit for what it is not entitled to? Did the Republican party enact the eight-hour law?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought they had.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It seems to me that was done either in the Fifty-second or Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Perhaps I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps the Democratic party enacted it, but I thought the Republican party enacted it. Whether they enacted it or not, they have had full power since and have failed to repeal it. If it is unwise, if it is unpatriotic, if it is demagogic, they are responsible for it equally with us; but it is neither; it is right. Men ought to have time and opportunity. The merest laborer in the world ought to have time and opportunity to do something else besides working at his job to pile one dirty dollar on the top of another. He ought to have a chance to read something. He ought to have a chance to love his wife and love his children and meet his friends. He ought to have a chance to enjoy himself somewhere with some proper recreation. The whole march of civilization is in the direction of removing men more and more every day from mere manual drudgery and to give some chance to intellectual and moral character to develop itself and to assert itself. [Applause.] The gentleman from Virginia may be right. It may be true that we passed this law. If we did, it is another star in the political horizon that sparkles in the proud old name of Democracy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But if it was unwise in the opinion of Republicans they ought to have repealed it. It is wise; it is right. The Speaker in that chair knows it is right. [Laughter and applause.] He has too much good old North Carolina blood in his veins not to know it is right [applause], and he ought not to have joined with these men this morning in bringing this rule into this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to know how much time I have left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield four minutes of that nine minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the proposed legislation has never been considered by any committee of this House. The provision reported from the Committee on Appropriations was materially different from that which this rule makes in order. The Committee on Appropriations never gave adequate consideration to the provision. It listened to statements lasting about ten minutes from the chief engineer of the Canal Commission and the Secretary of War. No other interests had an opportunity whatever to express any opinion upon this provision. The Committee on Rules has not jurisdiction of matters of this kind. Its jurisdiction is confined to matters touching the rules. The Committee on Labor of this House alone has jurisdiction to consider this matter. It has never considered the legislation. The Republican party has adopted rules for the organization and government of this House. Why not live up to them?

They complain that the Departments create deficiencies and do other things in violation of the law, and yet the great power of the Committee on Rules is invoked to make this House a mere automaton to register the will of the Secretary of War in everything affecting the Canal Zone. He is asking that the Chinese exclusion law be repealed so far as it relates to the isthmian canal work; at least the Canal Commission has so recommended. Will your next step be to repeal that law? One of the chief reasons for urging the abrogation of the eight-hour law on the Isthmus, as it appeared before the committee, was not so much that common laborers might not work more than eight hours, but because, as it was asserted, the Americans on the Isthmus were continually clamoring for leave to work more than eight hours a day.

But shrewd men control the Committee on Rules—the wise old Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], with twenty years of service, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], with eighteen years of service, in this House. In order to allay the fears of the American workingmen they modify this provision and make it applicable to alien labor. It has been the boast of the Republican party that it has been the party that desired to and did protect the American laborer.

Here is a Zone now reported by the canal officials to be in a healthy and sanitary condition, a field where the common labor of this country will be invited and should be employed, and yet, if this rule be adopted, if this provision be incorporated into this bill, it will be absolutely impossible for the common laborers of this country to be employed on the Isthmus in competition with the alien laborers.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The common laborers of the United States could have gone there during the past year and worked if they had chosen to do so. How many have gone there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They have gone there from Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has just been announced that after the expenditure of $26,000,000 the Zone is now in fit condition for American citizens to live upon it; and so fearful was the chairman of the Canal Commission of the unhealthy condition of the Zone that, although his salary was increased to $22,500, so that he might afford to live there, he has not spent two weeks in the six months that he has been in office upon the Zone. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] proposes to consume the balance of his time in one speech. Is that correct?

Mr. DALZELL. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The understanding is correct?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has the conclusion of the argument, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that this resolution has come before the House of Representatives. I regret particularly that it has come in this way. I never have believed that it was good legislation to legislate on an appropriation bill. In its wisdom the House of Representatives many years ago adopted a rule prohibiting general legislation on an appropriation bill, and it has been customary in this House not to violate that rule except practically by the unanimous consent of every Member of this House. That has been good in the past, it should be good to-day, and it has proven that it is a valuable rule for good legislation by the very precedent that it sets now.

Here is a great question, involving the great laboring body of the citizens of the United States, one that this country has thought about, discussed, and considered for years and decades, one that finally the Congress of the United States has written into the statute law of the land, that you propose to put the desecrating hands of a fresh rule from the Committee on Rules upon, in order to tear it to pieces.

Mr. Speaker, you are depriving the great laboring vote of the United States of the opportunity to come before the appropriate committee and give their evidence as to why this proposition should not be adopted and why it is detrimental to the labor conditions of this country, if they desire to do so, and I can say to you I know they do desire to do so. Adopting this rule "fresh out of the box" and forcing the House to vote on it now without proper consideration in the proper committee, I consider there is no reason for. You have ample opportunity to consider this proposition in the correct and legitimate way. There is no great speed. A bill can be introduced, if you wish to change this law, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and a hearing can be had on it within two weeks; and they could properly report their conclusions within a month.

Then the other side would have had a hearing. They would have been enabled to state to Members of the House their legitimate objections to this change in the laws of the country that relates to them; and you do not propose to give them an opportunity to be heard; but you propose to violate, to change the rules of the House of Representatives, and put this legislation on this appropriation bill by force.

Mr. Speaker, you say that this relates to alien labor. One might be led to believe that you did not know anything about the principles on which the contentions for the eight-hour law are founded when you state that proposition. Is not the alien laborer the competitor of American labor as any other American laborer? If you want to keep up the standards of American labor, must you not keep up the standard of his competitors? If you pull down the standard of the competitor of American labor and open the field for his competitor, down must come the standard of American labor with it of necessity. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, we have again witnessed on the floor of the House an attempt on the part of the leaders of the Democratic party to play politics in a matter pertaining entirely to the business of the Government and to economical administration of the expenditure of public moneys. Their solicitude for the American laborer is never manifested upon the floor of this House except when they think they see an opportunity of appealing to his prejudices. The gentleman from Mississippi talks about the Republican party stabbing American labor upon every occasion when there is a suitable opportunity. The Republican party of this country has never inflicted upon the American laborer any injury; on the contrary, its legislation has always been in line of the prosperity and for the benefit of our laboring class. Its record in this respect we are not ashamed to contrast with the record of the Democratic party. We need only to call attention to the injury that party inflicted upon American labor in the enactment of the Wilson tariff law in the Fifty-third Congress, when they sent American labor broadcast over this country in search of employment at any old hours per day, in search of bread and all the necessaries of life. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no use playing politics upon this proposition. The eight-hour law as applied to American labor is not involved in this controversy in the least. They know it as well as I do; but they simply think they see an opportunity of appealing to the prejudices of the labor of this country—the labor that is organized and seeking to establish a universal eight-hour standard throughout this country—and by their appeal to the prejudice of this class of labor to bring them to oppose those who advocate this proposition and the Republican party, who are responsible for it if enacted. What are the facts? The eight-hour law in this country, so far as the Government is concerned, applies only to the construction of public works. It does not apply to anything else. It does not apply to clerks in the employ of the Government. It applies only to labor employed in the construction of public works on a site owned by the Government. That law applies with equal force to a contractor and to a subcontractor. Now, our Democratic friends shout on this floor about having the Panama Canal constructed by contract. They tell us and the people that in this way it can be done at less cost to the American people than if it is done by the Government. I ask them to tell us where there is a contractor who, in the face of that law, applying as it does to alien labor and all other labor employed on the Isthmus, that would undertake to dig a yard of that canal by contract. How, then, can our Democratic friends reconcile their opposition to the removal of this obstacle to the building of the canal in the only way they say it should be constructed? They know that nothing but alien labor can be employed in the manual work of digging that canal. They seek to make it impossible, if that should be found to be the best policy, to let a yard of that work be begun by contract, by insisting on the eight-hour law, which was meant to apply to American labor, never intended to apply to alien labor, applicable to alien labor as well as American labor, and thus increase the cost of that canal to the extent of $50,000,000, according to the testimony of the men who are charged with the responsibility of constructing that canal.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I have no time; I have only a minute.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentlemen on the other side of the House are sincere in their advocacy of the construction of this canal in the shortest possible time and at the lowest cost, why do they not consider the American laborer at home, who must pay the taxes for the construction of the canal? Why their solicitude for the men who live in foreign countries? [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Ah, gentlemen may plead here that in the interest of humanity we ought not to require these aliens to work more than eight hours—a class who are accustomed to work ten, twelve, and fourteen hours a day. Mr. Speaker, this canal is being built for the benefit of all mankind——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). And it must be built by the United States, and at the expense of the people of the United States——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). And it is our purpose to build it at the smallest possible cost, even though we are compelled to resort to the employment of alien labor, because of conditions which make it impossible to employ American labor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Speaker recognizes the fact that I tried to get his attention before the gentleman took his seat.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman's time was up when the gentleman from Mississippi addressed the Chair, and the Chair, as is his custom, did not bring the gavel down until the gentleman had completed the sentence.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time for debate is exhausted. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JAMES. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be read again.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be again reported.

The resolution was again read by the Clerk.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 145, nays 102, answered "present" 8, not voting 130, as follows:

The following additional pairs were announced:

For the session:

Mr. BRADLEY with Mr. GOULDEN.

For this day:

Mr. DOVENER with Mr. BRANTLEY.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. CALDER with Mr. SMALL.

Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey with Mr. SWANSON.

Mr. WATSON with Mr. GRANGER.

On this vote:

Mr. JENKINS with Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota with Mr. WOOD of Missouri.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask how I am recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded in the negative.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to change my vote from "no" to "aye."

The name of Mr. UNDERWOOD was called and he voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the yeas are 146 and the nays are 102, and the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to reconsider the last vote.

Mr. DALZELL. And I move, Mr. Speaker, to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. All those in favor of demanding the yeas and nays will rise and be counted. [After counting.] Twenty gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the other side.

The SPEAKER. The other side will rise. [After counting.] One hundred and one gentlemen have arisen. The yeas are 20 and the nays are 101, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that no quorum is present.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Regular order!

Mr. PAYNE. We have just had a roll call that disclosed 248 present.

The SPEAKER. The roll call which has just been had disclosed a quorum. The Chair is in doubt whether the point is well taken, but will solve that difficulty by proceeding to count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-four gentlemen are present, and the motion prevails.

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12320—the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House of Representatives do now adjourn.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that the motion at this stage is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. While the Chair may have his opinion, the Chair will recognize the gentleman to make the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. All those in favor of the yeas and nays will rise and be counted. [After counting.] Fourteen gentlemen have arisen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt in regard to the matter; it takes 39, and only 14 have arisen. The Chair just counted everybody in the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I do not think the Chair has put the vote on the question to reconsider the vote and the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to lay that motion on the table. The count was made as to whether there was a quorum, but the Chair has not yet put the vote as to laying the motion to reconsider on the table, and I call for a vote on that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain. It was on the vote on the motion to lay the motion of the gentleman from Alabama on the table that the point of no quorum was made. The Chair counted a quorum. As many as are in favor of the motion of the gentleman from New York——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the Chair must have forgotten that I made a motion to adjourn, and in his courtesy he has declined to entertain it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always responds with pleasure to the gentleman from Mississippi when he is right, and sometimes when he is wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the Chair will remember——

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman is right this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 15, noes 114.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands tellers. All those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will stand and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-seven gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number—and tellers are refused.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that that motion has once been refused. That request was made and refused by a vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by those whose duty it is to watch and ascertain what the motions are—and it reenforces the impression of the Chair—that the yeas and nays were refused on the motion to adjourn. The motion failed and the House refused to adjourn. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 174, noes none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] The Chair having just counted 174 gentlemen rising on the left, now finds that 37 more are present on the right, whom the Chair did not count a moment ago. A quorum is present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Chair count the entire House that last time? The Chair could not have counted that side of the Chamber without looking at it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that when a question of no quorum is raised, and when the demand for the yeas and nays is made, the Chair has invariably taken great care to be correct in the count. The Chair had just counted those who had voted on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Chair might have been mistaken.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair is entitled to part of the time. [Laughter.] The Chair had just counted the number stated, 174, and had had his eye upon the Hall and saw that none had departed. Then the Chair counted the gentlemen not voting on the other side of the House. A quorum is present, the ayes have it, and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Chair during that whole count have the right to direct that gavel at me three times and count me all three times?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not, and will withdraw the direction. [Laughter.] The House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency bill, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, after line 2, insert the following:

"The provisions of the act entitled 'An act relating to the limitations of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia, approved August 1, 1892,' shall not apply to alien laborers employed in the construction of the isthmian canal within the Canal Zone."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have already several days ago stated my opposition to this amendment. This morning I again stated my opposition to the adoption of this amendment under the rule. It is not necessary for me to take up the time of the House with a further discussion of the proposition, but I am not willing to even allow it to be adopted in Committee without entering my protest against this class of legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire where this particular amendment originated.

Mr. LITTAUER. It comes from the Committee on Appropriations, as amended by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this particular amendment originated in the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. LITTAUER. I offered the amendment myself. It was acted upon by the Committee on Rules, and here it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. With due deference to the statement of my colleague, this amendment is not in the language of the rule introduced by him and referred to the Committee on Rules. It is an entirely different provision.

Mr. LITTAUER. Why, does the gentleman not know it was amended by the Committee on Rules and is here by authority of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was just about to state, Mr. Chairman, what had happened to the amendment suggested by my colleague in his resolution. His resolution provided for the abrogation of the eight-hour law so far as it applied to work upon the isthmian canal. That resolution went to the Committee on Rules. I am unable to state what transpired there to make that committee change the wording of the resolution introduced by my colleague. There must, of course, have been some good reason why the Committee on Rules changed this amendment so that it would apply only to alien labor. I have been unable——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think if the gentleman from New York will address a respectful inquiry to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], a member of the Committee on Rules, he will probably have a satisfactory answer to his question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the gentleman from Ohio, a member of the Committee on Rules, for the very full information that he has given to the committee as to what transpired in his committee when this rule was considered. I am not accustomed, when measures are brought before this House, to go off into secret places to inquire as to the motives that prompted the majority in bringing those measures before the House. If the Committee on Rules is unable to give any good reason, if the Committee on Rules can not justify its action, if the very versatile and ingenious gentleman from Ohio can do no better than to refer me to a gentleman on this side of the House, then I suppose that, in common with other gentlemen on this side of the House, I shall have to be content with that explanation. This proposed amendment has never been suggested or recommended by any official of the Government. The Committee on Appropriations did, at the suggestion of the Secretary of War, without ample consideration, without proper consideration, attempt to insert a provision in this bill that would abrogate the eight-hour law so far as it applied to this work. I have always been opposed to efforts to legislate upon appropriation bills. During the past few years I have taken, whenever possible, provisions which were legislative out of appropriation bills. This is a matter that is of vast importance to a great number of citizens of this country, and if no better reasons can be assigned than those assigned by the gentleman from Ohio for this action I am content to let the case stand in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, is this that eight-hour amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has reported the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but I am asking for information. Is this the eight-hour amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has reported the amendment. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire the Clerk to again report the amendment?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No. I was asking the Chair the simplest question in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman to draw his own conclusion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask that it be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate against the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has been recognized on a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me from all the facts in this case that this amendment can not affect the thing that it pretends to affect. If these people down there are paid by the hour, then it does not affect their wages, and in my judgment, with all due respect to the opinions of everybody else, I believe it is an effort to break down the eight-hour law; but let that be as it may, I am a good deal interested in another feature of this performance. It was stated here on the floor of the House this morning that the Secretary of War had suggested that the restrictions as to the exclusion of Chinese coolies be removed as to the Canal Zone. I had somewhat to do with the passage of that Chinese bill through this House, and the truth about it is if I could have gotten certain persons to stand up to me in another place than this we would have forced on the statute books of this country the Chinese-exclusion act as it went through this House, a much more stringent measure than the present law; but I want to read you the phraseology of the present law—just a little of it, I am not going to read it all:

That all laws now in force prohibiting and regulating the coming of Chinese persons, and persons of Chinese descent, into the United States, and the residence of such persons therein, including sections 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, and 14 of the act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers into the United States," approved September 13, 1888, be, and the same are hereby, reenacted, extended, and continued so far as the same are not inconsistent with treaty obligations, until otherwise provided by law, and said laws shall also apply to the island territory under the jurisdiction of the United States, and prohibit the immigration of Chinese laborers, not citizens of the United States, from such island territory to the mainland territory of the United States, whether in such island territory at the time of cession or not, and from one portion of the island territory of the United States to another portion of said island territory.

Well, now, it is a good while since I studied geography. The Republicans have broken down the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, but I have never understood that they had gone into the dictionary-making business, and according to the old geographies this Canal Zone is not an island territory, but it is an isthmian territory.

If the Secretary of War has asked that the restrictions as to the Chinese be taken off as to this Canal Zone, as was stated here a while ago, then it is apparent that this amendment is part and parcel of that same scheme. I do not propose, as far as I am concerned, to have the white laborers of the United States brought into competition with the Chinese coolies. [Applause.] And out of an abundance of caution I intend to introduce here, just as quickly as I can prepare it, a bill to apply the Chinese-exclusion act to the Isthmus of Panama and the Canal Zone, and, while I am at it, make it extend to Japanese and Korean coolies too, for coolies all look alike to me. [Laughter.] We might as well be honest about it. If certain people want this canal built by Chinese coolies, let them get up here and say so without any beating about the bush. But if they do not want it done, they will vote for that bill I intend to introduce here just as quickly as I can write it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CLARK of Missouri) there were—ayes 96, noes 40.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, Mr. LITTAUER, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 41.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 79, noes 35.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York Mr. LITTAUER, and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 35.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding: "The provisions of the law now in force excluding Chinese cooly laborers from our mainland and our island possessions are hereby extended to the isthmian Canal Zone, and shall also apply to Japanese and Korean coolies."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment as not being germane, and that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, sir. I desire to say also that the amendment just added changes existing law.

Mr. TAWNEY. By rule of the House?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. By the rule of the House? By the rule of the committee. Now, it seems to me a very strange thing if that kind of an amendment can be added here by that kind of a process and mine can not be added. While I am about it now, with the indulgence of the Chair, I want to read one sentence from a document that was put into the RECORD by my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. It is an address or something of the sort by Mr. Shonts:

There is no question of American labor involved in Isthmus work, and I repeat what the Commission has urged in its annual report, that it is a mistake to handicap the construction of the Panama Canal with any laws save those of police and sanitation, and that labor on the Isthmus should be excluded from the application of the eight-hour law, the contract-labor law, the Chinese-exclusion act, and any other law passed or to be passed by Congress for the benefit of American labor at home.

For that reason and by reason of this suggestion I offer this amendment. That is all I have to say about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of bailiffs and criers, not exceeding three bailiffs and one crier in each court, except in the southern district of New York: Provided, That all persons employed under section 715 of the Revised Statutes shall be deemed to be in actual attendance when they attend upon the order of the courts: Provided further, That no such person shall be employed during vacation; of reasonable expenses actually incurred for travel and attendance of district judges directed to hold court outside of their districts, not to exceed $10 per day each, to be paid on written certificates of the judges, and such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his accounts with the United States of reasonable expenses actually incurred for travel and attendance of justices or judges who shall attend the circuit court of appeals held at any other place than where they reside, not to exceed $10 per day, the same to be paid upon written certificates of said judge, and such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his account with the United States; of meals and lodgings for jurors in United States cases, and of bailiffs in attendance upon the same, when ordered by the court; and of compensation for jury commissioners, $5 per day, not exceeding three days for any one term of court, $85,000.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 22, after the word "States," insert: "Provided, That no part of said sum herein appropriated shall be used for the payment of the expenses of said district judges unless said certificates contain an itemized statement of said expenses."

Mr. LITTAUER. I make the point of order that this is legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MACON. I desire to state upon the point of order that the amendment certainly does not change existing law. It is not my purpose to change existing law. I simply seek to limit this appropriation and nothing more. If this amendment is adopted the law will stand just as it does now, and it will not affect any future appropriation. But if the amendment is adopted then, sir, it will withhold that part of this appropriation from any judge unless he furnish an itemized statement of his account in the certificate that he files with the marshal at the time he collects his actual necessary expenses. Therefore, sir, I can not understand how it would change existing law further than withholding this appropriation for the time being, limiting it, so to speak, until the judges furnish an itemized account of their expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Arkansas before him the statute regulating the payment of expenses of judges?

Mr. MACON. I have not, sir. But this is so clearly a limitation upon this particular appropriation, and does not affect the general law or change the general law, that I did not think it necessary to refer to any particular statute. I offered an amendment the other day which the Chair upheld as against the point of order, where it sought to limit the appropriation for the payment of salaries of customs officers at a customs place that returned no revenue to the Government.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, this deficiency is as it is stated in the existing law. The subject was thoroughly thrashed over last year when this matter was considered, and the gentleman seeks to amend the existing law.

Mr. MACON. The Chair will notice that if this amendment is adopted that the existing law will remain just as it is, and that this will not affect any future appropriations. Therefore how can it affect existing law? It simply seeks, as I said a moment ago, to limit this particular appropriation for expenses of judges who may be traveling from their special districts to attend courts elsewhere, and to call attention to the judges that the Congress has its eye upon them and that they must furnish an itemized statement of their expenses before they can receive any part of this particular appropriation. States require governors to furnish itemized statements of the money placed in their hands for contingent expenses, and I can not see why these gentlemen of judicial cloth shall not be required to furnish itemized statements of their expenses to the people who bear the burden. Coming back to the proposition, the Chair may hold against me because I am seeking to correct an evil. I insist, sir, that it is an evil that we ought to legislate against with all the force of the Congress.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman must admit, however, that part of this year's expenditure has already gone on. Why now change the law for the rest of the year? Why not bring it up as an original proposition on the bill for the ensuing year if he desires to correct the law—bring it up on the sundry civil bill?

Mr. MACON. This is simply calling the attention of the judges to this: That Congress has, as I said a moment ago, had its eye upon them. The gentleman in charge of the bill knows that the law that gives them their actual expenses, not to exceed $10 a day, has been abused by some of the judges of the United States, and it is our duty whenever we know of any wrong being committed by anyone, I care not how high up in authority he may be, to call the attention of the people to the fact; and I for one purpose to do that very thing as long as I have strength left in me with which to do it and they send me here to represent them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York to say that the wording of this proviso is a repetition of the wording of the statute relating to this question.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. That being so, the statute provides simply that "upon the written certificates of the judges" this money shall be paid. The amendment presented by the gentleman from Arkansas, in the form of a limitation, states what these certificates shall contain during the period that this appropriation shall be in effect. That is the view the Chair takes of it, and with that view the Chair must hold that it is a limitation upon this specific appropriation, and therefore overrule the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MACON. Division, Mr. Chairman. I want to see how many are in favor of this.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 62.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT—OUT OF THE POSTAL REVENUES.

To reimburse the postmasters at Tonopah and Goldfield, Nev., for expenditures for clerk hire, rent, fuel, light, and miscellaneous items in excess of the authorized allowances during the current fiscal year, and for necessary expenses during the remainder of the fiscal year, $5,000.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that item, on the ground that it is an expenditure that has no proper place in a deficiency appropriation bill. As I understand, it is nothing more nor less than a claim against the Government; and reserving the point of order, I would call on the chairman of the committee to state what the fact is in that respect.

Mr. LITTAUER. Your committee were so impressed with the justice of what is, no doubt, a claim, involved in this item, that they included it in this bill. We have since learned that it belongs to a class of claims of which there are quite a number now before the Committee on Claims, and must therefore admit that under the general rule it should not be included.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees for special-delivery messengers, $20,000.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of being enabled to place in the RECORD a letter which I will ask the Clerk to read in a moment. It relates to the debate which occurred when this bill was up for consideration on a previous day, relative to the question of appropriating for the transportation of coal from this country to the Philippine Islands. I regret very much that I did not have this letter in my possession at that time, but a gentleman who is entirely familiar with the situation has called my attention to the facts and circumstances under which the deficiency appropriation was made; and the letter is of such a character that it amply demonstrates the wisdom of the House in making these appropriations and standing by the legislation as it exists to-day. I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read the following letter.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the communication will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 24, 1906.

Hon. C. E. LITTLEFIELD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLEFIELD: The real difficulty as to the naval coal trade to Manila is that foreign houses absolutely control the hemp export trade, and will either give no cargoes to American ships bound home or force them to low and profitless figures. A few months ago rates on hemp to the Atlantic coast were about 50 shillings a ton. A large American steamer went out with coal to Manila. Freights instantly dropped to 32 shillings, even for a partial cargo. Immediately after the American steamer sailed freights rose again by foreign ships to approximately 50 shillings. This game is regularly played. I believe but one of our steam or sail ships has had a full return cargo from the Philippines.

Those American shipowners chartering tonnage for coal to the Government are compelled to figure at a higher price than foreign shipowners who are reasonably sure of a return cargo from Manila. That these foreign merchants at Manila, under the American flag, should thus make war on our merchant marine is, of course, outrageous, but we must bear it until the coastwise law goes into effect.

The Navy Department has not been fair on this question in its reports and testimony to Congress. It must have been aware of the handicap on American ships in Manila trade, but has not said a word about it—leaving the Democrats to infer, as they are glad to do, that our people are a lot of greedy monopolists.

I note that in yesterday's debate it was repeatedly stated that the rate in American ships on Navy coal to Manila was $7.50 a ton. The first American steamship accepted under this act of April 28, 1904, got $7. It appears in the debate that in the year before this law became effective the rate averaged in foreign vessels $6.53. But this American steamship was so delayed in loading that the three next steamers to offer asked $7.50, to cover the delay. Only these three cargoes have paid that rate. All the rest of our Navy coal sent out to Manila has gone, most of it, in sail vessels at a maximum of $6.50 and a minimum of $6. The latest charters, I understand, are at the $6 rate, 53 cents less a ton than the average in foreign bottoms from 1889 to 1904.

Of course the effect of the new law was to make foreigners bid their lowest, so as to prejudice the Navy Department and Congress against American shipowners. Apparently that has succeeded; but if the law were repealed, as the Democrats want, American ships would be driven out and the foreigners would put the rates up again, and the Navy would save little money.

If this matter comes up again in Congress some of these facts ought to be pointed out, and I know nobody so well equipped as you to do it.

Of course, if the subsidy bill is passed and the number of American ships increased, there will be a considerable reduction under this law in coal freights to Manila.

Cordially, yours, WINTHROP L. MARVIN.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if it will not disturb the text of that letter, I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Maine who this man is who wrote that letter?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Winthrop L. Marvin is the secretary of the Merchant Marine Commission that has been investigating the whole merchant-marine question under authority of an act passed by Congress. He has gone over the whole thing, he has traveled with the committee throughout the whole United States, and has made a very great study of this whole question. He is a very intelligent gentleman, and by the concluding part of the letter you can see he is a very appreciative gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Kissing goes by favor.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I should like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question for information about this writer. It is not a question of great importance, but still it may throw light on him. Is he that dispassionate kind of a man who, writing about a public subject while in the public employ, considers it courteous to talk about one party taking advantage of what a Department of the Government says or does in an official capacity? Is that the kind of a fellow who wrote that letter?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Of course I had nothing to do with the writing of the letter. I received it this morning in my mail. Whether the taste exhibited in the letter is entirely satisfactory to the gentleman, of course I will not undertake to discuss. He is a gentleman of high character and would be disposed to give a fair and dispassionate statement, although possibly in the letter he may have transgressed the bounds of propriety.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The probabilities are, then, that he did not make the statement in the letter under the most favorable circumstances, since it does not seem to be either dispassionate or impartial.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman can draw his own inference from that, so far as that is concerned. The letter comes to me entirely uninspired, as a matter of information. I suppose the gentleman who wrote it really intended me to take the information contained in the letter and use it myself, but I thought perhaps the better way was to put the letter right into the RECORD and let it show for itself. I hope the gentleman does not think that I intended any discourtesy to or reflection upon gentlemen on that side.

Mr. DE ARMOND. No; I merely wished that attention be directed to the character and tone of the letter, since the letter goes into the RECORD. It is evidently written by a man who desired to bolster a cause rather than by a man who tried to give information or to view the question dispassionately.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think if my friend was acquainted with the gentleman he would be satisfied that the gentleman intended to state the facts, although inadvertently he may have gone further than he would have if he had expected that his letter was to go into the RECORD. If he had known that I was to put it into the RECORD, he might have been more judicious, perhaps, in his language.

Mr. DE ARMOND. At the best, then, the letter shows that the gentleman did not write it under the most favorable circumstances, nor under the most happy auspices.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not think it is hardly subject to that criticism, if the gentleman from Missouri will allow me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Maine think the correspondent knows more about the facts about the transportation of coal for the Navy than do the officers of the Navy Department?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say this, that I have had occasion to examine somewhat into this matter, and the statements made by the distinguished gentlemen representing the Navy Department have not been very satisfactory, nor the manner in which they have treated the subject. I will not make any criticism upon them; but I haven't the slightest question that Mr. Martin writes upon this subject with the benefit of a full investigation and a complete knowledge of the subject, and I have not the slightest doubt—I do not know that he has stated all the details—I haven't the slightest doubt that he has stated the facts substantially as they are. I do not know what men in the Navy have said, but if they state anything to the contrary, I still think that Mr. Martin has accurately presented a picture of this situation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He states that coal is largely being transported now in sailing vessels. It appeared in the hearings before the committee that coal sent in sailing vessels, on almost every occasion, had so heated that the vessels had been compelled to put into port and unload, and it was impracticable to ship coal in sailing vessels for that reason.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not know what the hearings show; I do not know what the men testified to, and I do not know how vigorous a cross-examination they were subjected to. I am not familiar with the details, but I am satisfied that this gentleman states the facts which the situation will warrant when it comes to be investigated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we are entitled to take the testimony of the witnesses as they were presented before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the relief of J. J. Cole, acting postmaster at Nome, Alaska, fiscal year 1903, $63.50.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on that item also, because I understand that that is exactly of the same sort that has just been ruled out. I reserve the point of order in order to say, in explanation of my position, that I am advised by gentlemen thoroughly familiar with this subject that these three claims, one of which has been ruled out, and this one, and another one which follows, are exactly alike, and that there are a large number of similar claims now pending before the Committee on Claims. No matter what the facts may be—I do think that some of these items are meritorious—but I do not think we ought to select two or three and rush them through on an urgent deficiency bill and leave forty, or fifty, or a hundred equally meritorious at the mercy of the Claims Committee, who probably will never get a day in the House to have them considered. I feel as if we should treat them all precisely alike. While I would like to see them go through, I think a fair deal requires that this bill should be shorn of all these little claims.

Mr. LITTAUER. I agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the relief of Frank W. Swanton, postmaster at Nome, Alaska, fiscal year 1903, $187.81.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I make a point of order to that also.

Mr. LITTAUER. I want to say that, while the claims are meritorious, there ought to be some method whereby the Government can pay these claims more promptly that are so properly due from the Government, and not have them hung up year after year.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Bureau of Animal Industry: To meet the demands for more meat inspection and for microscopic inspection of pork, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the paragraph relating to agriculture, page 35, after line 13, add the following: "The sum of $115,000 be appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for such other inspection and work of the Bureau of Animal Industry as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I raise the point of order to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia raises the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think, Mr. Chairman, there is no question but this amendment is not subject to a point of order. The organic law authorizes the inspection, and it is simply an increase in the amount to be expended. As to the merits of the proposition, I trust that I may be heard on that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I could not hear the full reading of the amendment, but I want to ask if it is for meat inspection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, now I want to ask the gentleman who offers the amendment what he means by "other inspection?" Inspecting corn or wheat or what?

Mr. POLLARD. No; only in the Bureau of Animal Industry, and if the gentleman will notice the reading of the amendment, it only relates to the inspection that takes place in the Bureau of Animal Industry. He will find that that is it alone.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, what animal?

Mr. POLLARD. Why, the inspection of meats.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He has got all that he asks for for the inspection of meats—$20,000.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak to the amendment. I think I can explain my position to the gentleman clearly if he will give me a little time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman about to address himself to the point of order?

Mr. POLLARD. If the point of order has not been passed upon I would like to simply say this: That it seems to me if the original item in the bill is in order this certainly is. It only seeks to increase the amount the committee has authorized, and it is right in line with an infinite number of other items that have been inserted in the bill from its beginning, and run throughout the bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, on hearing the amendment read a second time it appears to me that it is subject to a point of order. It not only covers the inspection which is now authorized by law, but under this proposed amendment the inspection may be extended to a much wider field.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] whether the law providing for inspection was as broad as this amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. The law authorizing inspection by the Bureau of Animal Industry confines the inspection to animals and meats. It is limited to the inspection—microscopical inspection—of meats.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say to the gentleman who offers the amendment that the Secretary has seven hundred and odd thousand dollars now on hand, and I desire to say to the gentleman in addition to that that the Secretary asks for only $20,000 for inspection of meats, and we gave it at $20,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have proceeded with the discussion; but the gentleman from New York proposed a point of order, as I understand it. I ask him now, in fairness to the gentleman who has offered this amendment, to withhold his point of order and allow him to discuss the amendment for five minutes.

Mr. LITTAUER. With pleasure.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman from Georgia has reserved his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia, as the Chair understands, reserved his point of order and permits the gentleman from Nebraska to discuss the proposition. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska a question, if the Chair will permit me.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter entirely within the power of the gentleman from Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, if I am to have only five minutes to discuss my amendment, I prefer not to yield to a question at this time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I shall ask somebody before we get through with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, for the fiscal year 1905 the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Department of Agriculture was given $1,520,000. On account of the increase in the work in that Department, the natural increase that has been brought into it is a result of the investigations that have been going on throughout the West, and, in fact, throughout the whole agricultural section of the country, the Secretary of Agriculture came before the Committee on Agriculture one year ago and asked that he be given an increase over the appropriation for 1905. He asked for an appropriation of $1,581,000 in order that he might take care of the natural increase in the work of that Department. The Committee on Agriculture last year saw fit to give the Secretary only $1,431,520, I believe.

It will be observed that this Bureau of the Agricultural Department, while asking for an increase of $61,000, received $88,000 less than they were given for the fiscal year 1905. They received almost $150,000 less than the Secretary reported as being absolutely necessary to properly administer the work of the Bureau. It will be observed that under normal conditions, to say nothing about the increased demands from the West upon this Bureau, there will be a deficiency at the close of the present fiscal year of almost $150,000. The Department was able to save $35,000 by inducing the abattoirs of the country to pay for their own meat inspection and for the Government stamps that were placed on this meat which bears the certificate of Government inspection. This will leave a net deficiency of $115,000 for this fiscal year. The emergency demand for meat inspectors, on account of the extra demand for our meat products in Germany at the present time, calls for $20,000 more. In other words, the Secretary of Agriculture tells us that there will be a shortage for the present fiscal year of $135,000 for the Bureau.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, may I correct the gentleman right there? I am sure he does not want to make a mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POLLARD. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When Doctor Melvin, the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, was before the committee, he gave this testimony:

> Mr. TAWNEY. Did you not get $1,520,000 this year?
> Doctor MELVIN. No; that was last year. The total would be $1,566,520.

This shows that we gave him, according to these figures, within $20,000 of his estimate.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman not know——

Mr. POLLARD. Just one question at a time, if you please. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say this in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. The facts are, according to the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture and the other experts who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture, that the Department was only given $1,431,520, when, according to the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, according to his own statement, the chief of that Bureau asked for $1,566,520. That is certainly a reduction of more than $20,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman permit me to correct his figures?

Mr. POLLARD. If I have made an error.

Mr. LITTAUER. The estimate for the current year was $1,500,000. The agricultural bill carried $1,431,520. That is for the current year, all of which has not been expended, but I think you gave the statement wrong as to the appropriation for last year.

Mr. POLLARD. No, sir.

Mr. LITTAUER. For the year 1905 there was appropriated $1,250,000. Then there was a deficiency of $150,000, and then it was claimed that in addition thereto there was an old left-over balance from the foot-and-mouth-disease fund of $120,000, which, under that appropriation, they found they could use for this also, so they spent the balance of that also.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That made a total of $1,566,000.

Mr. POLLARD. One at a time, please. Mr. Chairman, I have here before me the testimony taken by the Committee on Appropriations upon this item, and I find in that testimony the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I do not find that any member of the committee during the hearings denied the statement that for the last fiscal year the Bureau of Animal Industry was given $1,520,000, and they ask this year an increase of that amount of $61,000.

Mr. LITTAUER rose.

Mr. POLLARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to be interrupted further by the gentleman from New York. The difference between the gentleman from New York and myself is simply this: The figures I gave are figures given to the Committee on Appropriations which were not questioned before that body, and I do not believe that the Secretary of Agriculture could come before that committee and make a statement that was absolutely wrong but what he would have been taken to account by the members of that committee, while the gentleman's figures distort the facts and do not accurately present the Secretary's position. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture not only did not get the appropriation he asked for for this fiscal year, but it was reduced $88,000 under what he had for the last fiscal year and almost $150,000 under what he thought the expenses of the Department would be for the ensuing fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POLLARD. I thank the gentleman and the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has five minutes more, and I would like to ask him this question.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to make my speech first, but I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, is not the milk in this cocoanut about this appropriation this, that on account of the high German tariff, which goes into effect on the 1st of March, shutting out our products, largely if not entirely, that the Germans are in a great rush to get our meats in there under the tariff as it exists now, and he wants this money for this inspection now on that account? Is not that true?

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman's question, if he will give me time. I want to read a little extract from the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, which present this matter, I think, in a clearer form than I can express it. Mr. LITTAUER, chairman of the subcommittee before whom these hearings were taken, asked as to the reason why this additional appropriation should be given, as follows:

Mr. LITTAUER. Because of the increased demand from Germany?

Secretary WILSON. Yes, sir; principally evidenced by the increased demand from Germany and also on account of the growth and development of the interests in the United States, and the building of about eighteen new packing houses and the enlargement of others. For instance, one packing house has twelve microscopists and they have called on us for thirty-five. That is a fair example of the demands upon us.

Mr. LITTAUER. With such an emergency, even, and not money enough to meet it, you are doing this work on your scab proposition?

Secretary WILSON. Yes, sir; that is true. We could do that, but Congress has an investment there, the work of years and the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and if we do not continue to wind it up, if we stop, that scab would go right back over the ranges, and it would have to be done over again. It would be exceedingly bad policy to let that happen.

Mr. TAWNEY. At the time of writing your letter of December 15, 1905, you had before you all the facts tending to show the necessity for this additional meat inspection?

Secretary WILSON. Provided they all came before me.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is your letter to the Secretary of the Treasury. I will read it:

"I have the honor to ask that you will transmit to Congress, for insertion in the urgent deficiency bill, an item of $135,000 under the appropriation 'Expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry, 1906.' This deficiency is rendered necessary for the following reasons: During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, the Bureau of Animal Industry had appropriations amounting to $1,520,000, while the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, is $1,431,520, a decrease from the former year of over $88,000. The amount of this decrease may be better comprehended when it is considered that the expenditures of that Bureau have been steadily increasing, so that at the beginning of the present fiscal year it was estimated that to carry on the work as it was then progressing would require $1,581,000. This indicated a deficiency of about $150,000, which has been partially offset by a saving of $35,000 on the purchase of meat-inspection labels and stamps by the proprietors of abattoirs and packing houses, leaving a net deficiency of $115,000. In addition it is now thought that $20,000 more will be needed to meet the demands for more meat inspection and for microscopic inspection of pork, making in all $135,000."

In other words, the amount needed for this additional inspection of pork was estimated at that time to be $20,000?

Secretary WILSON. No, sir; I think not.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what the letter says?

Secretary WILSON. That means this, that $20,000 more than $115,000 is needed. That is what is meant. We did not mean to say that $20,000 would be all we need. We need $20,000 more than the $115,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. You state the reason for which the additional sum is needed is the increased work of inspection?

Secretary WILSON. We state the reason for which $115,000 is needed, and then conclude:

"In addition it is now thought that $20,000 more will be needed to meet the demands for more meat inspection and for microscopic inspection of pork, making in all $135,000."

Doctor MELVIN. If we are not allowed the additional appropriation it will be necessary to further reduce the expenses of this quarter unless we shut off altogether our field work and the microscopical inspection.

Secretary WILSON. The microscopical inspections are necessary to keep up the business of the country.

Mr. Chairman, it is evident from the Secretary's testimony that $20,000 is not sufficient to meet this emergency. He states clearly and explicitly that $135,000 must be had to meet this increased demand for meat inspectors and to take care of the other work of this great Bureau. He tells us that unless $135,000 is appropriated it will be necessary to "further reduce the expenses of this quarter unless we shut off altogether our field work and the microscopical inspection." He also tells us that "the microscopical inspectors are necessary to keep up the business of the country."

The question before this committee to-day is whether we will permit the false economy, or I might say parsimony, of the last Congress to prevail, thus crippling the work of the great Bureau, or whether we will correct the error and give the Secretary of Agriculture sufficient funds to meet the natural demands that are made upon him from all parts of the country in the way of stamping out the infectious diseases that menace the live-stock interests of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the facts in the case are simply these: That the work of that great Bureau has been growing from year to year, and the Secretary of Agriculture has gone before the Committee on Agriculture of this House and asked for an increase in the appropriation for that Bureau.

What is the Bureau of Animal Industry? What is the particular scope of its work in relation to the Agricultural Department? That is the one Bureau that comes in direct touch with the people all over the country. It is under this Bureau that the Secretary of Agriculture has gone out into the western ranges and has stamped out the epidemic known as the "blackleg," where infected herds have been wiped almost from existence. It is under this Bureau that he has gone out into the western country, into the southwest country especially, and has made great progress toward exterminating the Texas fever in the cattle ranges. It is under this Bureau that the Secretary of Agriculture, with his experts, has gone into the great West and undertaken to stamp out the sheep scab. Hundreds of thousands of sheep have been dipped in a preparation of coal tar, which destroys this scab or parasite, and hundreds of thousands, yes millions, of dollars have been added to the wealth of the nation by the Secretary of Agriculture in his use of the money that has been appropriated for this Department. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but under this Bureau the Secretary of Agriculture has gone into the western country and he has stamped out the disease among our cattle known as "mange." Great numbers of cattle have been infected, and a great many of them have been dipped and rid of this disease. The ranges have been in a measure cleared of this pest. Now, then, he asks that he may be given this money in order that this work may be carried on, in order that the great cattle interests of the West may be protected; and I stand here, gentlemen, as a representative of the great West, demanding that we shall receive proper recognition at this time.

Mr. Chairman, do you know that that is the one Department of the Government wherein an expenditure of money is simply an investment? Every time the Secretary of Agriculture goes into the West or into the East, which he has done, and stamps out any contagious disease among the live-stock interests of the country, just to that extent the wealth of the nation is increased. It is the one Department of the Government, I say, where the expenditure of money is an investment and brings a return to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, in order to clear up the parliamentary situation, let us have a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman if he will not let my colleague have two minutes in which to finish?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to finish.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "twenty," in line 12, page 35, and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred thirty-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa desires to be heard on the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD], but I can not yield in my own time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] have three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POLLARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was about to remark when I was interrupted that the committee has brought in here a deficiency bill wherein they give for the State Department $123,000, to the Treasury Department $2,447,000, to the War Department $216,000, to the isthmian canal $5,500,000, and to the naval establishment $1,014,000, in round numbers. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the committee is liberal; it seems that it is willing to spend all kinds of money for the naval establishment, or for the extension of our Navy, or for the construction of the isthmian canal, to all of which I am willing to lend a helping hand. I want to say that while we are generous with the Navy and in the construction of the Panama Canal, we ought also to be generous in the protection of the interests of the great West.

What is the scope of the work that this great Department is doing from day to day? Do you know that during the last year the products from the farms of this country amounted to $6,415,000,000? Do you know that during last year the aggregate wealth of the farms of this country increased 4 per cent over what is was in 1904, 8 per cent more than it was in 1903, and 36 per cent more than it was in 1899? Do you know that for the expenditures in the Agricultural Department, which has been instrumental to such a large extent in helping to build up the wealth of the United States for the last fiscal year, that they were only given a little less than six and a half million dollars—the paltry price of one of our beautiful battle ships that grace the seas to-day; and yet, when it comes to the expenditure of any money for this Department, we hold up our hands in holy horror and say we must economize and cut out these expenditures. Gentlemen, it seems to me that economy has begun in the wrong place.

The exports of farm products for the last year were $827,000,000. In spite of the fact that our farm exports along certain lines have been increasing from year to year, yet it is a fact that the exports for the last year have been $32,000,000 under what they were for the year 1904—I believe it is the calendar year that these figures are for. Now, then, this decrease of $32,000,000—while our exports have been increasing along certain lines—has been made up and added to by a reduction of $41,000,000 on our exports of wheat, by a reduction of $5,000,000 on our exports of meat products, and by a reduction of $5,000,000 in the export of fruit products.

Now, then, gentlemen, here is a reduction of $51,000,000 in our exports, every dollar of which ought to be stopped. Why is it that our exports of wheat have dropped off $41,000,000 in the last year from what it was the previous year? Oh, say some, it has been due to the increased consumption of wheat. Yes, the consumption of wheat has increased, but what is the further fact? It is also a fact that for the calendar year of 1904 there were 120,000,000 bushels less produced than were produced in 1902, and something like 30,000,000 less than produced in 1893. Why is it that the production of wheat has fallen off? Do you know why it is? It is simply because of a little parasite that has been working on the wheat. This little parasite spread over the great wheat fields of the West and caused a reduction not only in the yield of wheat but almost made the wheat we did produce valueless.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, it is the work of this great Department for which I am pleading to-day to take up this great problem, which is so near the hearts of the people of the West, and bring about its solution so that we may have a variety of wheat to sow in that country that will not be susceptible to this little parasite known as "wheat rust."

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman must admit that this has nothing to do with the deficiency now being considered.

Mr. POLLARD. It simply has a bearing upon the work of this great Department, and I am trying to show the House its important work. You take the item of $5,000,000 in reduction in our meat products. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that if this appropriation is granted and if the Congress of the United States will give proper protection to the Secretary of Agriculture and furnish him with a proper fund for carrying on this meat inspection we will be able to extend our exports of meat products very materially.

It is a fact, Mr. Chairman, that our exports of meat products have been on the decrease since 1901. While our exports of salted and pickled pork and salted beef have been increasing, yet our exports of fresh beef and pork have been decreasing very rapidly. Our best foreign consumer is the United Kingdom. Our second best foreign consumer is Germany. It is with Germany that we are having trouble at the present time. Our exports of cattle on the hoof amounted in value in 1890 to $335,540. These exports increased until in 1895, when they were valued at $621,920. Since that time our exports of cattle to Germany have decreased until they reached $3,220 in value in 1901. They ceased entirely in 1902. Since 1901 we have not shipped any cattle to Germany. Our exports of swine have been decreasing also. The United Kingdom has not taken any of our swine since 1900, and our exports of these products have ceased almost entirely.

Our exports of bacon not only to Germany, but to the United Kingdom, have decreased almost 50 per cent since 1898. Our exports of beef products, cured other than by salting and pickling, to the United Kingdom have decreased from 1,721,000 for 1900 to 87,500 for 1904. To Germany our exports of the same product have decreased from 214,780 pounds in 1900 to 17,500 in 1904. Our exports of hams to the United Kingdom increased gradually until 1902, when it reached 202,390,263 pounds. Since that time they have decreased until in 1904 our exports of hams to the United Kingdom were 169,703,849 pounds. To Germany our exports of hams increased gradually until in 1898 they reached 11,963,631 pounds. Since that time our exports of hams gradually decreased until in 1904 our exports of hams to Germany were only 253,626. These figures are taken from the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture. While our exports of lard and other animal oils gradually increased to both these countries during this whole period, yet our exports of bacon and ham, beef, and canned meats other than those that are salted and pickled have decreased during this same period.

Mr. Chairman, this is a startling disclosure of facts. It seems strange to me when the Secretary of Agriculture comes before this House and asks for an appropriation for a careful, thorough, microscopical inspection of our meat products that will enable him to remove this prejudice that seems to exist throughout Europe against our meat products and to enable him to increase our exports.

Whether it is right or wrong, just or unjust, the German people are afraid of our meat products. Emanating from Germany, this suspicion of our meat products has spread over nearly all of the countries of Europe. This is the condition that confronts us, and is a fact, not a theory. Germany demands a double microscopical inspection of our meats. She not only subjects our meat to a critical inspection herself, but she demands that it must first be inspected by our own Government before it will even be permitted to land in Germany.

It is especially to meet this condition, this emergency, Mr. Chairman, that the Secretary has come before Congress asking for this appropriation of $135,000. To show that he is acting in good faith and is endeavoring to break down this prejudice against our meat, he tells us in his annual report just made public that during the year 1905 the total number of animals inspected before slaughter was 66,000,000; the total number inspected after slaughter was 40,000,000 animals. In 1905 the total number of live cattle inspected for export was 824,900, 423,000 sheep, and 2,300 horses. In the same year he inspected and disinfected 734 vessels that carried animals for export.

Gentlemen of the committee, there is not a question that can come before this Congress that is of so great importance to the whole American people as this one question of breaking down the prejudice against the meat products of the American farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POLLARD. I can not ask further indulgence of the House, but I would like unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise my remarks in the RECORD. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this item of $115,000 additional for the Bureau of Animal Industry illustrates very clearly what Congress must determine at this time in respect to deficiencies not authorized by law. When the estimate was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Agriculture estimated a deficiency of $135,000 in the appropriation for the work of the Bureau of Animal Industry. The letter transmitting this estimate did not disclose whether or not the appropriation for the current fiscal year had been apportioned, or, if apportioned, whether it had been waived. Upon the receipt of the estimate I wrote the Secretary of Agriculture calling his attention to the fact that before the committee could consider this item we would have to know whether or not the law had been complied with; whether the appropriation had been apportioned, and, if apportioned, was the apportionment waived, and, if waived, the reasons therefor.

To my letter the Secretary replied that in calling this item a deficiency, as he did, it was a misnomer; that it was not a deficiency, but intended to be an estimate for an emergency appropriation to be made immediately available. The only emergency, however, the Secretary mentioned was the increased demand for meat inspection growing out of the unusually large demand in Germany for American meat and meat products. This, he claimed, was due to the tariff law of that country going into effect next March. In his letter he estimated that this increased demand for meat inspection would require an appropriation of $20,000. Now, in his reply he also makes the statement that the appropriation was apportioned by the Department at the beginning of this fiscal year, and that the apportionment has not been waived, and that there was no deficiency and there would be none. He also testified before the committee that he has now $761,000 of the appropriation for this fiscal year unexpended.

Now, the apportionment he made was this: He apportioned $400,000 for each of the first three quarters of the fiscal year and $281,000 for the remaining quarter, including the unexpended balances of the first two quarters and $35,000 received on the sale of labels to the proprietors of abattoirs—the total amount available for the last quarter under the apportionment, with these items, equaling $281,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is only one conclusion to be drawn from that apportionment. The Department either estimated that that Bureau during the last quarter of this fiscal year would require no more than $281,000 or the officer making the apportionment concluded that when the last quarter arrived Congress would be in session and they could rely upon our increasing the appropriation to the amount they estimated in the last Congress would be necessary.

Mr. POLLARD. I should like to ask the gentleman whether that is not the exact situation that he finds every Department of the Government in?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not.

Mr. POLLARD. Have they not anticipated relief from Congress?

Mr. TAWNEY. Every deficiency estimate allowed by the committee was where the apportionment was made and waived or where there was some extraordinary emergency requiring it. This, with few exceptions, was the rule of the committee. In some cases where the apportionment was waived without sufficient cause, notably in the Navy Department, the deficiency was not allowed though the apportionment was waived.

But, Mr. Chairman, here is the fact——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that the Secretary of Agriculture made an apportionment of the original fund as to which this amendment is a deficiency?

Mr. TAWNEY. He did.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And do I understand him also to say that in accordance with the law or in compliance with the law he did not waive the provisions of that apportionment?

Mr. TAWNEY. He did not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I should like to inquire what reason, if any, the Secretary of Agriculture gave to the committee for not complying with the statute of the United States?

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say in answer to that that the Secretary claims he has complied literally with the statute. He says, in reply to my letter, that there is no deficiency in this appropriation and that there will be no deficiency, and therefore there was no necessity for waiving the apportionment.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then why does he ask for it?

Mr. TAWNEY. He does not ask for it on the ground of a deficiency, but he asks for it partly on the ground of an emergency and partly because Congress did not appropriate as much as estimated to be necessary. In his letter to the Treasury Department transmitting this estimate of deficiency he says:

SIR: I have the honor to ask that you will transmit to Congress, for insertion in the urgent deficiency bill, an item of $135,000 under the appropriation "Expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry, 1906." This deficiency is rendered necessary for the following reasons: During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, the Bureau of Animal Industry had appropriations amounting to $1,520,000, while the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, is $1,431,520, a decrease from the former year of over $88,000.

The amount of this decrease may be better comprehended when it is considered that the expenditures of that Bureau have been steadily increasing, so that at the beginning of the present fiscal year it was estimated that to carry on the work as it was then progressing would require $1,581,000. This indicated a deficiency of about $150,000, which has been partially offset by a saving of $35,000 on the purchase of meat-inspection labels and stamps by the proprietors of abattoirs and packing houses, leaving a net deficiency of $115,000. In addition it is now thought that $20,000 more will be needed to meet the demands for more meat inspection and for microscopic inspection of pork, making in all $135,000.

Now, the committee has allowed the amount which the Secretary estimated would be necessary to meet the emergency growing out of the increased demand for meat inspection and microscopic inspection of pork, namely, $20,000. The remainder, $115,000, which he includes here, is a deficiency in the general appropriation, without any explanation except by inference, which is that Congress failed to appropriate as much as the Department estimated, and that they proceeded to expend the appropriation on the basis of their estimate and not upon the basis of the appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. They did not confine themselves to the appropriations. I understand the chairman of the committee that the committee have turned down the Navy Department on a request for a million dollars on a deficiency under exactly similar circumstances?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And now are treating the Agricultural Department precisely the same as they have treated the Navy Department?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, did I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that the Secretary of Agriculture was not asking for this?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then if he does not ask for it, what particular necessity is there that we should put it into the bill?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for a question? As I understand, the principal matter of importance here is the preservation of the examination of meat for export. You propose here an appropriation of $20,000 for that purpose. It is manifestly impossible to tell in advance how much money will actually be needed for that purpose. We all hope that it will be a great deal more than $20,000. May I ask whether it would be the ordinary purpose of the committee, in case the fund already appropriated is drawn on to a greater extent than $20,000 for this emergency, to allow the Secretary of Agriculture to do that and make it up in the general deficiency bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that the Secretary of Agriculture had, on the 1st of January, 1906, $761,000, all of which can be expended, in the discretion of the Department, for meat inspection if necessary. On account of this emergency he requested $20,000 for this specific purpose, which request we have complied with.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, it is true, as the gentleman states, that on the 1st of January there was seven hundred odd thousand dollars for the use of the Bureau of Animal Industry. It is also true that under the law the Secretary of Agriculture has to so apportion that as to make it extend until the 3th of June. Now, here is an emergency, and you propose to appropriate $20,000 for that emergency. I am not complaining about the action of the committee in any respect whatever. But suppose the Secretary of Agriculture finds that he needs more than $20,000 on account of the emergency, will he be warranted in doing that without endangering the balance, and will it be made up to him if he calls upon you for a deficiency appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. In that event, all the Secretary of Agriculture has to do is to waive the apportionment and expend the appropriation as he sees fit, and then come to Congress with a legal deficiency.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. All he has to do is to comply with the law.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but what will be the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I can not forecast the action of the committee on a hypothetical case such as he submits.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may not be willing to forecast it, but I think he can.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am willing to say this, that if the Secretary of Agriculture would come to us and say there was an emergency that justified the waiver, it would be a legal deficiency. He saw the point, and for that reason, in the second letter, denied that it was a deficiency, and said that the present appropriation was ample to meet the requirements of the service under the apportionment of the appropriation as made at the beginning of this fiscal year, and that on account of this emergency for additional inspection and microscopic inspection of pork it was necessary for him to have $20,000 for that purpose, and for that purpose we made the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. I understand that; it is an emergency that affects a few large cities, the packing cities—Omaha, Kansas City, Chicago, St. Joseph, and a few other places. It also affects the hog industry throughout the United States. But we are not the whole thing under the Bureau of Animal Industry——

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what we are trying to teach them. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. There are other branches of the service. We do not want our service crippled in this emergency by preventing the shipping of pork to Germany before the 1st of March. But we can not get the committee to say whether you will meet the emergency in case we need the money.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will answer the gentleman. There is nothing in the law or in the fact that should prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from going out and expending the $761,000 which he had available for this purpose on the 1st of January if he sees fit to do it.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but he won't do it, and run the risk of ruining the balance of his service.

Mr. TAWNEY. He will not endanger the service, because he admits that mange is practically eliminated from the two States in which it was so prevalent, as well as the scab; but he says we want to keep up our cooperative work with the State boards of health in respect to inspection of various diseases of this kind. While he admits that at this season of the year there is not the same opportunity for the carrying on of this field inspection that there is at other times in the year, in the judgment of the Committee on Agriculture he can use this appropriation, or a sufficient amount of it to meet the emergency.

Mr. MANN. Is it not also true that he can refuse to take any of it for that purpose and use it for the reduction of mange and the scab in sheep? What we want the Secretary of Agriculture to understand is——

Mr. TAWNEY. That was the very reason we put this in in a specific way.

Mr. MANN. What we want the Secretary of Agriculture to understand from the action of Congress is that he shall endeavor to comply with the demand for this meat inspection out of the funds that he may have under his control, without taking it away from those other places where otherwise he would use it, except for this emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will yield me more time, I will be very glad to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota may be extended. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would like to know why we should pay for this at all. Why should not the Secretary be authorized to appoint such inspectors as the packers themselves are willing to pay for?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, that under existing law the Secretary of Agriculture can not enter into any arrangement with the packers whereby they could pay for the service of inspectors employed by the Secretary.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. But would it not be absolute justice?

Mr. TAWNEY. But the law prevents the Secretary from doing it. When before the Committee on Appropriations, in answer to that question, he said he should advocate the change of existing law before the Committee on Agriculture so as to provide for the payment of this inspection by the packers themselves.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I hope the Committee on Agriculture will come to the same conclusion that the Secretary has in regard to this matter.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I received a letter from a packing institution in my district about two weeks ago informing me of the fact that it was impossible for that institution to secure adequate inspection service, that they had applied to the Secretary of Agriculture for inspection service and had been informed that the appropriation made by Congress was inadequate, and the institution complained that they could not sell their products in a foreign market without inspection and insisted that Congress at least ought to provide an adequate fund for the inspection of products of slaughtering establishments. Now, if there be seven hundred and odd thousand dollars under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture, why is it that he can not be induced in some way to use a portion of that fund for the relief of the numerous packers throughout the country in order that they may get into the foreign markets with their products?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not answer why he does not do thus and so. I will say, however, in reply to the gentleman's suggestion that he has been called upon by a packing institution in his district to inquire into this, that that suggestion was no doubt prompted by the Bureau of Animal Industry. This is another illustration, and one of the most conspicuous ones, in connection with the one published in the morning papers by the Secretary of the Navy, of the attempt on the part of Departments to coerce Congress into giving appropriations or increasing appropriations beyond the amount provided for in the regular appropriation bills. Bureaus and Departments are resourceful. They have every facility for reaching Members of Congress, and in an emergency like this they use them. When they are unable to secure from the committee the amount of deficiency appropriations they want they appeal for more, on the ground of public necessity, through the press and individual Members. They rely on the popularity of their particular Department in the hope of coercing Congress into increasing appropriations, even beyond the estimates they themselves have made for the current fiscal year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But what is my slaughtering establishment going to do while we wrangle down here over a question of etiquette or power between the Departments?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not a question of etiquette, it is a question of whether the Departments or Congress should determine the amount and standard of public expenditure. The Agricultural Department had $761,000 on the 1st day of January, every dollar of it available for this purpose if the Secretary of Agriculture sees fit to use it for that purpose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But how can we get him to use it?

Mr. TAWNEY. When he comes to the Committee on Appropriations and says that, growing out of this emergency, there is an increased demand for meat inspection and microscopic inspection of pork, and wants $20,000 for that purpose, and we give it to him, what justification has he to publish, as he has been doing, interviews in the press of this country that unless we give him $135,000 fifty millions of meat contracts will be lost to the American people?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, then, should we not appropriate an adequate amount of money for this purpose instead of making what we call "lump-sum appropriations?"

Mr. TAWNEY. That is exactly what we have done in this bill. We have given him $20,000, the amount that he estimated to be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But that is not enough.

Mr. TAWNEY. And whose judgment is to control in this matter? He said it was.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the statement of the Secretary before the committee. It is as follows:

Mr. TAWNEY. In other words, the amount needed for the additional inspection of pork was estimated at the time $20,000.
Secretary WILSON. No; I think not.
Mr. TAWNEY. That is what the letter says.
Secretary WILSON. That means this, that $20,000 more than the $115,000 is needed. That is what I meant.

Mr. LITTAUER. Needed for what?

Mr. HAUGEN. For the inspection.

Mr. LITTAUER. It does not say that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the chairman this question in order that he may explain to the committee what the position of the Committee on Appropriations is: If the Secretary of Agriculture refuses to apply any portion of the $761,000 which he had on hand the 1st of January to meet the emergency created by the German tariff law, would it be considered a good reason for Congress to appropriate additional funds in order that he might consider an emergency existing?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think it would not.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to read the statement of Secretary Wilson on this subject:

Secretary WILSON. Just now Germany is starving for the want of meat, and she must have it. If we could have had time and money enough to inspect the meat as fast as it was wanted, they said they could have sold $50,000,000 worth. Now, it reacts on the farmer, because his hogs are not being sold.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I would like to supplement the question of the gentleman from Chicago. If an emergency has arisen under the German tariff which demands more inspection, would it not be better policy to pass a law authorizing the Secretary to appoint inspectors at the expense of the packers? The banks pay for the privileges of inspectors. I know of no other business in the country where the Government steps in to furnish labor in order that people may prepare their goods for market. Would it not be better to have inspectors appointed by the Government, to be paid for by the packers themselves, who are to get the benefit of it?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think, Mr. Chairman, that until the existing law has been changed Congress ought to appropriate all that in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture is necessary to meet this emergency, and that is exactly what we have done—not according to his revised statement when before the committee, but according to his official letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, who transmitted it to Congress, in which he expressly stated that $20,000 more than the $115,000 deficiency would be necessary to meet this particular emergency.

Now, there is no feeling on the part of the Committee on Appropriations against the Secretary of Agriculture personally, or against the Department; not in the least. There is no man in public life for whom I entertain a higher regard than the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture; but, Mr. Chairman, if we are going to put an end to the policy that has obtained for so many years of allowing Departments to fix the standard of our appropriations regardless of the judgment of Congress, we must make the attempt now when we are confronted for the first time with the interpretation of this law. [Applause.] That was the view the committee took of it, and that is the view the committee hopes this House will take. Having provided for the emergency in respect to meat inspection, and the Secretary having more than $700,000 available for this Bureau, if it be necessary to use it, we feel that no injury will be done and the Departments will be given to understand that they must apportion and adhere to their apportionment unless some extraordinary emergency arises that could not be anticipated.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment which I offered is agreed to it will increase the amount from $20,000 to $135,000, or the amount asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture, "to meet the demand for more meat inspection, and for microscopic inspection of pork." If you will turn to pages 8 to 19 of the hearings——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to get clear whether if your amendment, which I could not hear, is adopted it would permit any use of the money appropriated by it for the purpose of inspecting cattle and sheep under the law for the different diseases?

Mr. HAUGEN. If you will turn to page 35——

Mr. NORRIS. I have it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I simply move to strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and thirty-five," increasing the appropriation from $20,000 to $135,000, which is exactly the amount suggested by the Secretary himself.

Mr. NORRIS. That must be used only for microscopic inspection of pork.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; but they have other money to use for other inspections.

Mr. NORRIS. They could not use any of this amount?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not any of this amount.

Mr. LITTAUER. Where does the gentleman get any idea of the necessity of $135,000 to meet a demand for microscopic inspection of pork?

Mr. HAUGEN. I was just coming to that, if the gentleman will allow me. The amount will be exactly the amount asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture——

Mr. LITTAUER. Where?

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if you will turn to the hearings on pages 8 to 19 you will see that it is important—it is absolutely necessary—to increase the appropriation in order to successfully carry on the work of the inspection of meat for the eradication of cattle mange and sheep and cattle scab and for the extermination of contagious diseases among cattle in the Western States, and it is necessary in order to extend our trade in meat.

On account of the growth and development of the packing industry in the United States, the building of some eighteen new packing houses and the enlargement of others, the demand for inspection has increased, and unless the appropriation is increased to $135,000 the Department will not only be unable to meet the demand to extend the inspection to new and smaller packers, so as to enable them to sell meat in interstate or export the same as larger packers that have our inspection service, but will be unable to meet the demands made by the larger packers as well.

What is the situation? As has been stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], we are confronted with hostile legislation in Germany. The German Empire proposes in the near future to tax our meats to such an extent that it will practically exclude American meats. Just at present Germany is meat hungry, and we find there a good market. Everybody is anxious to sell, but before they can sell the meat has to be inspected.

The meat must be delivered before a certain time or they will be compelled to pay the tax; hence the demand for inspection. Turn to page 13 of the hearings and you will see Secretary Wilson says: "One packing house has twelve inspectors, and they are asking for thirty-five." Turn to page 14, Secretary Wilson says:

> Just now Germany is starving for the want of meat and she must have it. If we could have had time and money enough to inspect the meat as fast as was wanted they said they could have sold $50,000,000 worth more. It reacts on the farmer, because his hogs are not being sold.

The packers have expressed their willingness to pay for the inspection themselves, but the Department can not allow it because the law will not permit it. The Comptroller of the Treasury has so held. Now, what are we to do about it? It is up to Congress. Will we appropriate $20,000, as proposed by this committee, and deprive the cattle raisers and the packers of this market and glut the market at home, let the cattle, hogs, and sheep rot on the ranges and farms, or will you increase the appropriation, as requested by Secretary Wilson and Doctor Melvin? Uncle Sam has, according to the Federal census of 1900, 43,000,000 cattle, 41,000,000 sheep, 37,000,000 swine. I believe, according to Mr. Garfield's report, we annually slaughter about 12,500,000 cattle. Are you going to say to the packers, to the 5,700,000 families on the farms, "Sell your cattle, sheep, and hogs at home for what you can get; we will see to it that you are shut out from foreign markets by keeping down appropriations," or will you help them to get it out of the country and dispose of it?

I believe they are entitled to friendly consideration in this matter. According to the Federal census report of 1900, the rural population is nearly 40,000,000 people, or 51.9 per cent of the total population. The semiurban population is 8,000,000, or 10.8 per cent. The urban is only 28,000,000, or 37.3 per cent. All are more or less dependent on the prosperity of the agriculturist. Out of the 29,000,000 people engaged in gainful occupation more than 10,000,000 are engaged in agriculture, while only 1,250,000 are engaged in professional services, 5,500,000 in domestic and personal services, 4,750,000 in trade and transportation, and 7,000,000 in manufacture and mechanical pursuits.

Not only are the 10,000,000 employed on the farms or the 6,000,000 families interested in this matter, but, in fact, all become interested, as the inspection subserves the health of the consumer. So, my friends, if the pruning knife is to be applied, if retrenchment and reform is the policy of this committee, I am with you, and nobody will give it more hearty and loyal support than I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I submit to you if that is to be the policy, use discretion, be honest, correct abuses, cut out your deadwood you hear so much about, amend your civil-service laws, and in making appointments give consideration to integrity, experience, and capacity for performing the required work. Scrutinize the appropriations for the Post-Office Department, especially the item for carrying the mails by transportation companies, look into the Army and Navy appropriation, and so on all along the line, and without much difficulty or exertion we can reduce the appropriation 10 per cent, or $80,000,000. Appropriate that money for public buildings and rivers and harbors, and I believe all will join me in saying "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

But I protest against it all being done at the expense of the agriculturists. In looking over your report I find that the estimates, or amount asked for, is $17,807,824.52. The amount recommended in this bill is $15,215,503.75, which is about 85 per cent of the amount asked for, while you only give about 15 per cent of the amount asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture. This seems entirely out of proportion. If it is found necessary to reduce appropriations for the Agriculture Department there are bureaus in that Department that can probably be dispensed with or the expense thereof reduced without serious loss to anyone; but I submit to you that the work done and the value of the Bureau of Animal Industry can not be dispensed with and is worth every dollar expended for the whole Department.

So, my friends, I suggest you apply your energy in reducing salaries in place of continually increasing them and building up stalls in the public crib, giving soft berths to some near and dear friend who may want an office, and apply economy all along the line, and not altogether at the expense of agriculture.

If you will investigate, you will find that the appropriations made are small as compared with other appropriations. For a third of a century Congress has appropriated in all, regular and permanent appropriations, fifteen and one-half billion dollars. Of this amount three and one-quarter billion was appropriated for pensions; one and one-quarter billion for the Army; eleven hundred million for the Navy; one hundred and two millions for fortifications; three hundred and sixty-two millions for rivers and harbors, and only $71,717,475.06 for agriculture, or out of the grand total, regular and permanent appropriations, for thirty-two years less than one-half of 1 per cent has been appropriated for agriculture. Is that amount extravagant when you stop to consider that 34.3 per cent, or 5,700,341 families out of 16,600,437 families in the United States are engaged in agriculture, and that their farms and farm property is valued at twenty and one-half billion dollars, as compared with the total wealth of the United States, which was ninety-four billion?

Gentlemen, I submit to you, in view of the present situation, the need and importance of this inspection, the urgent request made by Secretary Wilson, the demand made by the packers and cattle raisers, the justice of the claim that this increase should be made, and that these people should not be deprived of a market and good prices through our neglect. I can not believe but that all of you will recognize that the agriculturists of this country have a just claim, and that they are entitled to friendly consideration in this matter. Nobody has done more to maintain and perpetuate this grand, great, and glorious Government of ours. Nobody has contributed more to this nation's growth and greatness. Nobody has responded more freely, cheerfully, or heartily in times when our Government institutions were in danger than have the people on the farms. They are the bone and sinew of this great Republic. Nobody renders more heroic and patriotic services to this country than they do in times of peace and in times of war. Their many noble and loyal deeds entitle them to more friendly consideration than this, and I sincerely trust this amendment will pass.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I agree entirely with the remarks just made by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa; but the question before us is simply one of proper departmental administration. We have not to deal with any emergency. There is to-day, subject to the use of the Secretary of Agriculture, a sufficient sum of money to take care amply both of meat inspection and microscopic inspection. Ample provision was made a year ago by the Committee on Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture, according to law, divided the sum into four parts. He apportioned the appropriation: Four hundred thousand dollars to the first quarter, $400,000 to the second, $400,000 to the third, and $231,000 to the fourth quarter. During the first two quarters of the year he did not expend the full amount of his apportionment. He saved $25,000 in each of these two quarters. Consequently, when he entered upon the third quarter, on the 1st of the month, he had $400,000 for the third quarter, $231,000 for the fourth plus the $50,000 he had accumulated from the two earlier quarters.

Now, there is an emergency for more expenditure in connection with meat inspection. Has the Secretary a sufficient fund to meet the emergency? He has the $400,000 balance for the third quarter; $231,000, the balance for the fourth quarter of the year, and the $50,000 he saved; and he says to us: "I need for all the work of my Department" (not for this particular emergency, but for all the work of the Department) "$150,000 additional." He has plenty of money to inspect all the meat that is offered for inspection, but during this third quarter of the year there is an extraordinary emergency demand for meats to be shipped to Germany, not for immediate consumption, but because the tariff laws there will change on the 1st of March. Suppose that he had acted in his discretion, as the law permits him, and expended during this third quarter of the year $100,000 or $200,000 more for this purpose, and then come to us and stated: "I have waived my apportionment because the demands of the situation were that I should expend this $200,000 to meet this emergency." Surely the Committee on Appropriations would have recommended that whatever was needed to carry out the proper administration of his Department during the rest of the year would certainly be granted to him. He makes no such case as this. He simply says: "I will not waive this apportionment. I hold myself to the apportionment as I have originally made it, so that the last quarter of the year will be short, and I will come to Congress and ask it for $150,000 to make up a sufficient amount so that the last quarter will be equal to the others."

Now, what is the purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa? To increase the meat inspection from $20,000 to $135,000. What is the object of it? We have $700,000 available now in the hands of the Secretary for just that purpose. The committee put this new item in this bill in order that we might meet, exactly as stated by the Secretary, the amount necessary to supply the demand for this special purpose—to meet the extraordinary demand—while, in fact, before this very bill will become law that emergency will have passed. The only question here is, Do you want to give a great sum of money to the Department of Agriculture to conduct this Bureau of Animal Industry, or do you want to force them to keep within the appropriation, the same as we do with all the other Departments?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the gentleman will permit me, is it not true, if the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa is adopted, that the House will be giving the Secretary of Agriculture $115,000 more than he asks for meat inspection and microscopic inspection work?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is true. Why, his letter reads exactly so. He has now $700,000 for this purpose. Is there an emergency which calls for more money? No! But the Secretary needs to use the money for the necessities of the Department, and he should come to us for a deficiency in a proper way.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is not this in his letter?

Mr. LITTAUER. Gentlemen, it is simply a matter of properly administering the funds. The Secretary devoted a greater sum of money to some other purpose.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is it not true that the Secretary of Agriculture, under date of January 6, 1906, as appears on page 5 of this report, states in so many words that there is no deficiency and there will be none?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is the real point of the whole matter. There is no deficiency here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments be now closed.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw that in order that the gentleman from Nebraska may be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has made the motion and the Chair has put it.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that all debate on this amendment be closed in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments be closed in ten minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Several MEMBERS (without rising). Division!

The CHAIRMAN. When gentlemen rise in their places and demand a division, as the rule provides, the Chair will recognize them, but not otherwise.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 47.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, within the second district of Nebraska, which I have the honor to represent, is located the third largest meat-packing industry in the United States. It does not consist merely of the packers and the packing houses, but includes an army of commission men, stock-yards men, and others who have built up a wonderful industry out there in the West; and back of the packing houses, back of the commission men and stock-yards men, stand the farmers, and they are demanding at our hands a just recognition.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that gentlemen understand this question. The Secretary of Agriculture asked for an appropriation of $115,000 independent of the additional demand made by reason of the German tariff. That request has been absolutely denied by the committee, and the committee is before this House, Mr. Chairman, watching the spigot while the bunghole of the barrel is wide open.

The $20,000 asked for was a separate matter, made necessary by the increased demand in Germany, and that the committee has seen fit to grant. The committee has recognized the justice of that demand; but the request of the Secretary of Agriculture for a general appropriation of $115,000 stands ignored by the committee and denied by the House unless the amendment prevails. We may talk as we please about keeping the heads of Departments down to their estimates. Gentlemen in this House must know that the criticism and the condemnation of the people interested in this question will fall upon the Members of this House and not upon the Secretary of Agriculture if we deny this reasonable request. There is not a Department of the Government that has done more for the agricultural community, and there is not a Department of the Government that comes closer to the people to-day than the Department of Agriculture. [Applause.] I do not know the Secretary of Agriculture, but I believe he is honest and conscientious, actually trying to benefit the people whom he is supposed to serve. [Applause.]

They say that he has stated that there is no deficiency; and Mr. Chairman, he has. There is no deficiency now; but when we have been appropriating money under urgent deficiency bills for the isthmian canal, have we waited until that money was spent? No; we have provided the money for the purpose for which it will be required. I ask this House, Mr. Chairman, to do the same thing for the farmers and stockmen and packers of the country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I will, for a question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the chairman of the Appropriations Committee assured the gentleman that this deficiency would be taken care of, when there was a deficiency, in a deficiency bill which will come up later in the session, would not that be satisfactory?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. In the first place, the chairman of the committee has artfully dodged that question. There is no promise and no pretense of a promise before the House, and there is no evidence before the House that there is any intention on the part of the committee to meet that requirement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to say to the gentleman that I represent a constituency in sympathy with his desire, but it seems to me that this can be met when there is a deficiency, by submitting it to the Committee on Appropriations; and then, if the committee does not want to vote that appropriation to supply the deficiency, the House can force the committee to do so.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I will answer that question. In the first place, I have no confidence that the committee would provide for the deficiency. Its members are not sufficiently close to western interests to do it. In the next place, the packing interest, the cattle industry, and the hog business of the country are so circumstanced that they can not wait until the House passes a deficiency appropriation bill in May or June. The money then would come too late to be used effectively.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the speech of the gentleman from Nebraska, and I yield to him my time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Has a Member the right to yield his time under the five-minute rule to another?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to put the question of unanimous consent to the committee. Is there objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts yielding his time to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I must object to that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I understand this is a special appropriation asked for in order to provide money for inspection of meat which will be exported to Germany before the 1st of March, the date of commencement of the operation of the German tariff. I was expecting to get some information on the subject as to the necessity of further inspection from the gentleman from Nebraska, and I now would welcome any question which the gentleman from Nebraska might ask me. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if it should prove to be a fact that in the packing industry in the West it is necessary that the Secretary of Agriculture and the packers and the cattlemen and the hog raisers should know weeks and even months in advance just what force of inspectors they are to have and what money is to be provided then, would a deficiency appropriation passed in May, which would have to go through the Senate, be of any service to them during the present fiscal year ending June 30?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I have not in my possession the information which would enable me to answer that question, and I would welcome an expression of the gentleman's own opinion on that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I shall be very glad indeed to give the gentleman information. Suppose, for instance, that this amendment should be agreed to now, and this deficiency bill should be reported and go to the Senate, and should pass the Senate in the usual and reasonable time, then, even under such circumstances, all the available time would be required to arrange for the proper and profitable use of the appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture has said that he does not propose that any deficiency shall exist. He has said that he does not propose to violate the law, and I honor him for it; but in the interim the interests so well represented by the Department must suffer.

Mr. LITTAUER. What violation would there be if he did waive the apportionment, if there was an emergency?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. The gentleman is begging the question. There is no proposition here to waive the apportionment. You are asking the Secretary to-day in this House to go on and expend money that he has not got, and yet you decline to say to the House that you will favor an appropriation for it when the deficiency is reported.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I have not quite finished answering the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If this House is going to discipline the head of any Department of this Government, go to the head of some Department that does not touch the people so closely. [Applause.] Do not stand here and try to enforce that rule at the expense of the farmers of the country. Do not stand here and try to enforce that rule at the expense of the stockmen of the country. Do not stand here and try to enforce that rule at the expense of the packing interests of the country; because these are the vital interests building up the West, and we propose to protect them to the best of our ability. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The clock says that the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts are concluded. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture be permitted to address the committee for three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], who is on the other side, have the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois modifies the request of the gentleman from New York that each gentleman may have three minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that we are making a mountain out of a molehill. This matter is entirely in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture. We have heard the chairman of the subcommittee on Appropriations state that there was available in the Bureau of Animal Industry $761,000 on the 1st day of January.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I refuse to be interrupted. I have not but a minute. Every dollar of that he can devote to the inspection of meat or microscopic inspection of pork, if he thinks it wise. Now, if he has run up against an emergency, all he has to do is to do what any prudent business man would do under the same circumstances—curtail some of his other expenses; that is the whole thing in a nutshell, and he has got $761,000 to do it with.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the situation seems to have summed itself up in about this manner: An appropriation of a considerable sum is put in charge of the Secretary of Agriculture to be disbursed in his discretion, and, among other things, he has authority to use any part of that sum for purposes of meat and stock inspection, but he has determined that there are other demands on the appropriation for which he should use it, and has notified the packing interests throughout the country that there are not sufficient funds in his hands to justify him in increasing the inspection service. This notice is given at a time when there is a general demand throughout the country for an increase of this service to enable American producers to avail themselves of favorable conditions in European markets. Now, whether the fault is in the unreasonable obduracy of the Secretary of Agriculture or in the stubborn disposition of Congress to discipline him for using the fund under his control for other purposes, the country is suffering just the same; so why not increase the appropriation and bring a much-needed relief to an important industry?

Mr. TAWNEY. In what respect is it suffering?

Mr. LITTAUER. How will the gentleman relieve the situation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. By immediately increasing this appropriation to $135,000, so that the Secretary of Agriculture can increase the meat-inspection service, and then let the Committee on Appropriations and the Department of Agriculture thrash out the controversy under conditions that will not be so disastrous to the public. Relieve the situation without delay, and settle the question of etiquette, or whatever it may be, afterwards.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am through now, but I will listen to the gentleman's question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, if the gentleman is through, I have no desire to interrupt him. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have concluded my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAUGEN) there were—ayes 41, noes 51.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. LITTAUER took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Is a further amendment to that paragraph in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Then I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 35, after the word "necessary," in line 13, add the following: "the same being to meet additional and unusual demands for such inspection, and the further sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for usual and general purposes authorized by law."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. LITTAUER. That it is new legislation and changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment as presented is obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, the amendment not being germane. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, amend by striking out, on line 12, the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Now, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order. Debate is closed. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska) there were—ayes 26, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, at this time I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter which I received in this morning's mail from Hon. S. L. Patterson, commissioner of agriculture for the State of North Carolina, with reference to the extermination of the cattle tick; and in that connection I desire to say also that this letter is in accordance with resolutions of the Farmers' Convention of North Carolina and of the State board of agriculture of North Carolina, which I have heretofore presented. I wish to call this letter and these resolutions to the attention of the House and Committee on Agriculture. I see the chairman of that committee on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to print a letter in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

NORTH CAROLINA DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Raleigh, N. C., January 23, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES R. THOMAS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. THOMAS: An effort will be made to secure the cooperation and aid of the Federal with the Southern State governments to exterminate the cattle tick.

Cattle raising must play a far more important part in the future in our southern farm economy than it has done since the war. The tick is its greatest menace.

This department, taking the lead in this, as it has done in several other measures, has secured the exemption of all the transmontane counties and several of the piedmont counties from the restrictions of the Federal quarantine laws. Getting away from the cattle mountain ranges, some of which have been badly infested with ticks, and reaching the stock-law section of the State, we will make rapid strides eastward. We will soon reach Mecklenburg, Rowan, Davie, Yadkin, and Stokes, and every subsequent year will mark a substantial addition of territory to the exempted area. But it is an interstate question, and the Government ought to give its aid. As our exempted territory extends eastward, longer stretches of Virginia and South Carolina border lines are left exposed, unless these States shall keep faster step in their respective territories.

Let me give you just a few figures:

According to the last report of the United States Department of Agriculture there are in the Southern States, exclusive of Virginia, Tennessee, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory, 97,474,876 cattle—that many cattle subject to quarantine restrictions, except in those localities where the tick has been eradicated.

Suppose these cattle average 450 pounds in weight—low estimate, is it not?—and suppose the increase of value consequent upon the extinction of their deadliest enemy is placed at only one-fourth of a cent per pound—another too low estimate—the increase of value would at once amount to $109,659,235. Or suppose we say, in a rough way, that a value of $1 per head will follow, and we add to our cattle's worth $97,474,876. But this is not all or the greatest benefit to come.

It has not been safe to import clear-blooded cattle into the tick region of the South. They died. With the tick removed, cattle could be transported here from any section of the world in safety. A new impetus would be given the industry, such as has not been known for many years, if ever before, in the history of the South. More cattle of good breeds would be introduced, feeders would utilize their own rich cattle foods, such as pea-vine hay, corn stover, cotton-seed meal and hulls, and our big fertilizer bills might be reduced by the substitution of increased savings of homemade manures.

All this can be done. Secretary Wilson is in favor of the bill. I know you will give us your aid.

Yours, very truly, S. L. PATTERSON, Commissioner.

I am trying to make my letter as short as possible, but I want to add that of the number of cattle quoted North Carolina is accredited with 9,175,782 head. They are of larger size than cattle farther south. It would be certainly safe to count their added value at $10,000,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Seal fisheries in Alaska: Two janitors at Government houses on St. George and St. Paul islands, Alaska, for services during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, at $240 each, $480.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and in the time allotted to me I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of this bill. When we began the consideration of this bill I inquired of the gentleman how many offices were created in the bill—an urgent deficiency bill—and his recollection was one or two.

Mr. LITTAUER. This was the one that I then had reference to.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, there are three right here. Assistant chief of bureau, one; two janitors at Government houses, three. Now, I have figured up the number that are created in this bill, and I find them to be twenty-four. I shall not stop here, of course, to make further inquiry, but I desire to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to this fact, and a little later on I am going to call attention of the House to this enormous increase in the creation of offices.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman include the officers provided for at the old prison at Fort Leavenworth?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you class those as the creation of new offices?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is hardly fair.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not want the committee to feel I am undertaking to admonish or criticise them.

Mr. TAWNEY. We have to provide them in order to protect the Government property.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. My purpose is simply this: I hope the committee will appreciate that I am not criticising in any offensive sense the committee. I call attention to this as we go along so that the Committee of the Whole House may appreciate the fact that these items are always creeping into these bills. I will show to the House a little later, when I get an opportunity, in the proper place, that these increases are getting to be tremendous, and I think we must get in a position where we must stop it.

Mr. LITTAUER. I agree with you entirely. You have just mentioned three additions to the force. The first is an assistant chief of bureau, and then two janitors at the Government houses in Alaska. Now, it happened that the Government houses in Alaska were formerly under the charge of the Treasury Department, and when they were transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor provision was omitted for those two janitors, though their insertion here is practically a continuation of that service.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not think this is a very bad illustration; not by any means.

Mr. MANN. Is it not? What is the need of an assistant chief of the Bureau of Manufactures?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is a serious question. It is clearly demonstrated to us that the Bureau of Manufactures, which came into existence on the 1st of July last, was doing considerable editorial work on consular reports that in the end would result in a large saving, throwing out from the Printing Office a lot of miscellaneous articles, which had been sent in here culled from newspapers throughout the world by our consuls. This work of editing, as now conducted, demands an assistant to the chief, in order that there might be some proper editing of these reports.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it is in order. If it is, I simply wish to move to strike out the last word, in order to suggest to my distinguished friend this: We transferred the publication of the consular reports from the State Department to the Department of Commerce and Labor for economy's sake, for the purpose of having it put in with the Bureau of Statistics. Now, having made the transfer for economy's sake, we propose to appropriate twice as much money to have less work done than was the case when it was in the Department of State. While I have no criticism to make of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. LITTAUER. I agree with you entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Miss Bertha J. Marsh, daughter of B. F. Marsh, late a Representative in Congress from the State of Illinois, $5,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, after line 21, insert: "That the appropriation made for expenses of special and select committees of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1906 is hereby made available for miscellaneous items, including salaries and labor."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of this amendment I would state that in former years the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives, and also the appropriation for special and select committees, were in one gross sum. We separated them a year ago, giving $25,000 for miscellaneous expenses and $20,000 for special and select committees. The expenditures out of the miscellaneous fund amount to $21,000 out of $25,000. The resolutions passed yesterday will require more provision, and as very little has been spent out of the sum appropriated for special and select committees, we here transfer that sum to the miscellaneous fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The sum of $4,768.87 is hereby authorized to be transferred from the appropriation for "public printing and binding" for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, to the appropriation for "leaves of absence, Government Printing Office," for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, and is hereby reappropriated to enable the Public Printer to comply with the provisions of the law granting thirty days' annual leave to the employees of the Government Printing Office during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like an explanation from the gentleman in charge of the bill of this deficiency appropriation for the benefit of the Printing Office, and for leaves of absence. What is the object of that?

Mr. LITTAUER. This is not a deficiency. This is a transfer of appropriation in order that leaves of absence may be provided for.

Mr. PERKINS. I know that; but was there not a provision made in the general appropriation bill for leaves of absence?

Mr. LITTAUER. There was; but not of a sufficient amount.

Mr. PERKINS. Then it really is a deficiency which you pay?

Mr. LITTAUER. There was appropriated $325,000 to enable the Public Printer to comply with the provisions of the law granting thirty days annual leave to the employees of the Government Printing Office. This proposition is a transfer of appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand it is a transfer, but the reason for the transfer is that the appropriation of $325,000 was not sufficient; in other words, the appropriation for leaves of absence in the Printing Office in the last year amounts to $330,000?

Mr. LITTAUER. Three hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars.

Mr. PERKINS. Three hundred and twenty-nine thousand and odd dollars for leaves of absence?

Mr. LITTAUER. Under the law.

Mr. PERKINS. I know it is under the law.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] that leaves of absence in the Printing Office are on an entirely different basis from leaves of absence in the Executive Departments here in Washington.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. The law as construed gives to the employee leave of absence as a matter of legal right, and requires the Government to pay him during the time of his leave of absence. Now, there is a balance in this appropriation for the Government Printing Office for the fiscal year 1905, and the balance due on account of leaves of absence for that year is to be paid by transferring from that balance the amount necessary for that purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, as a result of that difference in the law, the amount paid for leaves of absence in the Printing Department is not a larger percentage of the total wages than in any other Department of the Government?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think it can be so.

Mr. TAWNEY. My own impression, I will say to the gentleman, is that the law ought to be changed; but whether it can be changed or not I do not know.

Mr. LITTAUER. In the Printing Office employees get thirty days' leave and they are paid for twenty-six working days. In other Departments they get thirty days' leave, and a thirty-day sick leave if they happen to become sick.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY THE AUDITOR FOR THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

For pay of assistant custodians and janitors, $19.57

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order simply for the purpose of inquiring whether these claims are the same kind of claims that have already been stricken out of this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. These are audited claims.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. A charge on the Treasury in any event.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from New York if "section 2," in line 3, page 40, should not be stricken out?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is section 2 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment for contesting seats in Congress in contest entitled "Koonce v. Grady," act March 3, 1905, $1,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order upon the last item, at least until I can inquire about it.

Mr. LITTAUER. What is the page?

Mr. MANN. Page 46, line 16, "For payment for contesting seats in Congress." I do not know what the act of March 3, 1905, may be, but of course it is an entirely unusual proceeding.

Mr. LITTAUER. The act authorized the expenditure, but we made no appropriation.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman whether there was a special claim act or private bill, or anything of that kind?

Mr. LITTAUER. The act is a very short one:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Frank D. Koonce, of the Third Congressional district of the State of North Carolina, the sum of $1,000, as amount of expenses incurred by him as contestant for a seat in the Fifty-third Congress in the contest entitled "Koonce v. Grady."

No appropriation was made. It is a perfectly proper account and consequently was included in the unsettled claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman press the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I do not desire to say anything on the point of order, but I want to say a few words, and will move to strike out the last word if necessary. I have no recollection of that private claim bill. It has been the consistent practice of this House ever since I have been a Member of it to refuse to pay any of these claims unless they were audited by the proper Committee on Elections in the proper manner. I do not know how this came in. Of course the House had power to pass a special bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the law does not require that they shall be audited by the committee.

Mr. MANN. The law does not require it?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a minute? I believe I can make a statement that will explain this item. Probably no further explanation is necessary than to say that the last Congress considered it and passed an act directing this payment. As I recollect the facts, about twelve years ago, in the Fifty-third Congress, Mr. F. D. Koonce contested the seat of Mr. B. F. Grady from the Third North Carolina Congressional district.

Mr. MANN. Since the gentleman has started he recalls the case to my mind in the last Congress, and so far as I am concerned I am satisfied.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I will proceed for a moment and say that Mr. Grady was the sitting Member as a Democrat, and was paid the amount of his expenses during that Congress—$2,000, as I recollect. Mr. Koonce, the contestant, unfortunately lost his dwelling house by fire, in which were all his papers, subpœnas, vouchers, and other evidences of his expense account, and therefore he could not present them to the chairman of the Committee on Elections for his approval in that Congress, and none of his expenses were paid. In a subsequent Congress the House passed a bill reported by the Committee on Claims, but the Senate then failed to pass it, as I understand, because its Committee on Claims questioned its jurisdiction over it, and thought perhaps the amount should have been included in one of the usual appropriation bills. Since it was to cover expenses of an election contest in a prior Congress it could not regularly go in a general appropriation bill, there being no law authorizing it, the Elections Committee having no jurisdiction over expenses incurred in prior Congresses. The last Congress again passed the bill, and the Senate also passed it, so that now this appropriation is authorized by a direct act of Congress and is a perfectly legitimate claim.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3679. No Executive Department or other Government establishment of the United States shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract or other obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations unless such contract or obligation is authorized by law. Nor shall any Department or any officer of the Government accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property. All appropriations made for contingent expenses or other general purposes, except appropriations made in fulfillment of contract obligations expressly authorized by law, or for objects required or authorized by law without reference to the amounts annually appropriated therefor, shall, on or before the beginning of each fiscal year, be so apportioned by monthly or other allotments as to prevent expenditures in one portion of the year which may necessitate deficiency or additional appropriations to complete the service of the fiscal year for which said appropriations are made; and all such apportionments shall be adhered to and shall not be waived or modified except upon the happening of some extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which could not be anticipated at the time of making such apportionment, but this provision shall not apply to the contingent appropriations of the Senate or House of Representatives; and in case said apportionments are waived or modified as herein provided, the same shall be waived or modified in writing by the head of such Executive Department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure, and the reasons therefor shall be fully set forth in each particular case and communicated to Congress in connection with estimates for any additional appropriations required on account thereof. Any person violating any provision of this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or by imprisonment for not less than one month.

Mr. MANN. I desire to reserve the point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order; I do not make it.

Mr. CHANEY. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Before proceeding with amendment, the Chair thinks the point of order should be disposed of.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the opinion of the distinguished gentleman from New York on this proposition. We make appropriations in the appropriation bill for substitute clerks for the purpose of covering extra help in the post-offices of the country, largely for the purpose of taking care of the Christmas trade and holiday extra work. Now, that is not an extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which can not be anticipated. It is anticipated. We make appropriations for that purpose, and yet——

Mr. LITTAUER. Is the appropriation made for that special purpose, to be expended in that special payment, or does it come in a lump-sum appropriation?

Mr. MANN. It is made to cover the extra holiday trade and to give the extra help.

Mr. TAWNEY. Christmas comes every year. It is additional work, as a rule, every year at that time, that particular time of the year. Does not the Department in making its estimate for the appropriation for the entire service include the amount that would cover that item; and if it does, if the apportionment is made, would not the apportionment be made so that the expenditures could be met at that particular time of year?

Mr. MANN. Why, if the Department should happen to guess it correctly they could. If they could guess accurately in June what service they would need in December, they could guess it correctly; but if they did not do it, the party who furnished the mail service could be removed and might be imprisoned.

Mr. LITTAUER. The apportionment is always made on the estimate. The estimate is based upon the best past knowledge and experience of the Department. If that estimate has proved to be improperly made and emergencies arise under it, it becomes an extraordinary occasion, and consequently the apportionment should be waived.

Mr. MANN. If it was only "emergency," I would have no objection to it, but this is an "emergency which could not be anticipated."

Mr. LITTAUER. If it is an extraordinary emergency.

Mr. MANN. "Extraordinary emergency or unusual circumstance which could not be anticipated at the time of making such apportionment." They actually have a wide latitude. The Secretary may say that he could not anticipate it, but we do anticipate it by making the appropriation.

Mr. LITTAUER. Then under the appropriation he makes his apportionment.

Mr. MANN. Here is a case, and this is no theoretical proposition. They have just laid off in the Chicago post-office fifty-two clerks employed under this appropriation. The service is behind. There is mail lying in the Chicago post-office to-day unhandled that came in there last week, unhandled because it is absolutely impossible to carry it all through. We are trying to take care of that in this bill to a certain extent. I appreciate that fact. It is partly the lack of the machinery there. But this situation may arise at any time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Under the existing law there can be no question, as it seems to me, but that the head of a Department or the proper official can take care of precisely the situation to which you refer.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but since the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] has issued his pronunciamento in this House during this debate the First Assistant Postmaster-General has stated that he did not propose to put himself in a position where he could be justly criticised for overriding Congress and assuming that Congress did not make the proper appropriations, and has cut these clerks off within a week's time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say to the distinguished gentleman that "the gentleman from Maine" never has made the slightest suggestion that is entitled to that construction by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, or any other man at the head of a Department, in my judgment.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to take the construction of the gentleman from Maine on his own language, although my own construction was that he had made that sort of a suggestion.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. There is no department of the Government—and I am glad of it, as far as I am concerned—there is not a department of the Government that is not watching the statements of gentlemen on this Appropriations Committee and the statements of the gentleman from Maine in reference to this question, and they are all endeavoring to keep within the limits of the appropriations. But the question is whether, where an emergency really does exist which could be anticipated, which was anticipated in making the appropriation, whether they shall be permitted to use the appropriation. I do not propose to insist on the point of order, but I want to call the attention of the committee to it, because the language is more faulty now, in my judgment, than it was last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The head of a Department can estimate for the amount of money that he believes is necessary for every single necessity in his Department. He can start out with that privilege. Now, if he estimates too low, owing to an unforeseen emergency, something that he could not anticipate, it is not a violation of the rule for him to come in for a deficiency appropriation, and he does not violate the rule. It is as wide open as any discreet man ought to ask. It is not so close as to work any hardship on a man who wants to stand by the law. That is the whole situation.

Mr. CHANEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the section: "And the Attorney-General, upon complaint made to him of the violation of any provision of this section, accompanied by evidence showing a prima facie case of such violation, shall proceed against such person by due process of law."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. LACEY. I desire to discuss the proposition here to create an additional crime.

Mr. LITTAUER. The provision in this section is the law now.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he thinks, by increasing the penalty and enlarging the scope of this offense, it will be of any real utility? These officers are on their good faith anyhow. They have to be trusted, and the attempt to make a crime out of any mistake in an apportionment or to increase a crime already created, by enlarging it in any way, is a matter of unnecessary severity.

Mr. LITTAUER. We are not enlarging any punishment. It is already provided by law. It has been the law during the present fiscal year.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Except that you are providing for removal from office.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is already provided for.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is it under existing law?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is already provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 50, line 11, insert after the word "expenditure," the following:

"Only upon the written certificate of the official immediately in charge of the particular bureau or governmental establishment for whose benefit the waiver or modification shall be made."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I can state what this amendment will accomplish. The provision in the bill requires a waiver to be made by the head of the "Executive Department or other Government establishment having control of the expenditure." This will prevent the head of the Executive Department waiving or modifying the allotment unless he has a certificate in writing from the man immediately in charge of the bureau or the establishment for whose benefit the waiver is made. It appears in the hearings that the chief clerk of the Treasury Department took up verbally with the Secretary the question of waiving an apportionment and they waived it. Now, the man responsible and who should be punished was the chief clerk who persuaded the Secretary to make the waiver. This amendment will enable us to reach the men in the bureaus who are shielding themselves behind the Secretaries of the Departments.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment is impracticable. It is the heads of the Departments that we want to hold responsible for excessive expenditures of appropriations made by Congress. Do you propose that the heads of Departments shall hide behind their subordinates on a certificate on his part that the waiver is necessary? It is the responsibility of the heads of the Departments that we want to hold responsible, and not that of a subordinate clerk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Every member of the Cabinet himself relies almost entirely upon the heads of his Bureau.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is their responsibility.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You will not accomplish what you desire if you attempt to hold members of the Cabinet responsible and have them removed from office when waivers are improperly made. The men you will be compelled to look after and should want to reach are the heads of the bureaus upon whose requests the waivers are made. The gentleman from Minnesota complained yesterday that the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering had persuaded the Secretary of the Navy to make a waiver——

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon, I did not say the Chief had persuaded him. I said the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering had submitted to the Secretary of the Navy the fact that he could not under the apportionment, carry out the object or work which the Secretary required of him, and thereupon the Secretary of his own motion waived it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One of the papers published in the city to-day says that the President of the United States and the Attorney-General of the United States thoroughly disagree with the gentleman from Minnesota and believe that the Secretary of the Navy did what was proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12320—the urgent deficiency bill—and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment relating to the repeal of the eight-hour law for the Canal Zone.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment; if not, they will be considered in gross.

There was no further demand, and the other amendments were considered, and agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment mentioned by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota demands a division. Pending the division the Chair will lay before the House the following personal requests.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. GRANGER was granted leave of absence for five days, on account of sickness in his family.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. FRENCH, a reprint of the bill H. R. 12316 was ordered.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, on which a separate vote was demanded, and the gentleman from Minnesota demands a division. Pending that, the gentleman from New York moves to adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order that a motion to adjourn is not in order while the House is dividing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order, unless it should be patent to the Chair that it was a dilatory motion. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CLARK of Missouri) there were—ayes 34, noes 43.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. TAWNEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. When the motion was made to adjourn the House was about to divide on the question then pending, was it not?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it now in order for me to demand the yeas and nays on that question?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, on that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

H. R. 3010. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas C. Meadows.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JAMES) there were—ayes 45, noes 40.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for the Government Hospital for the Insane—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Postmaster-General withdrawing an estimate of appropriation for expense of delegate to the Universal Postal Congress—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation for purchase of a building on the legation grounds at Tokyo, Japan—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an estimate of appropriation for the militia—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of appropriation for the Marine Corps—to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for enlarging Fort Wright Military Reservation, near Spokane, Wash.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Rainy River, Minnesota—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to the inquiry of the House, a communication relating to civilian passengers on transports—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9757) to amend paragraph 34 of section 7 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 585); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12314) to amend an act approved February 3, 1905, authorizing the construction of a bridge across Red River, at Shreveport, La., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 586); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 312) to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River, at Yankton, S. Dak., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 587); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 979) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River, at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak.," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 588); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LACEY: A bill (H. R. 13190) to protect birds and their eggs in game and bird preserves—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. JENKINS: A bill (H. R. 13191) authorizing a circuit judge to hold or designate a judge to hold the district court of Hawaii and the district court of Porto Rico—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HILL of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 13192) to incorporate the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BABCOCK: A bill (H. R. 13193) to prohibit the killing of wild birds and other wild animals in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BURNETT: A bill (H. R. 13194) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to reclassify the public lands of Alabama—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BISHOP: A bill (H. R. 13195) for acquiring by condemnation and dedicating as public parking the triangles and intersections of Sixteenth street and Park road and of Park road and Mount Pleasant street, in the city of Washington—to the Comittee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. GOULDEN: A bill (H. R. 13196) to provide a suitable memorial to the memory of Christopher Columbus—to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. GRONNA: A bill (H. R. 13197) providing for the segregation of $1,000,000 from the reclamation fund created by the act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Irrigration of Arid Lands.

By Mr. ROBERTS: A bill (H. R. 13293) to amend the act of Congress approved March 3, 1901, and amended by the acts of March 3, 1903, and April 27, 1904, which authorizes the appointment of boatswains, gunners, and warrant machinists as ensigns in the Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN: A bill (H. R. 13294) for the relief of the growers of tobacco—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BURTON of Delaware: A bill (H. R. 13295) to create and to provide for a special roll in the War Department of the United States to be made up of volunteer officers of the civil war who have especially distinguished themselves by long and faithful meritorious service in the said war, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 27, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER, LOUISIANA.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12314) to amend an act approved February 3, 1905, authorizing the construction of a bridge across Red River, Shreveport, La., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act of Congress approved February 3, 1905, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.," be, and is hereby, revived and reenacted.

SEC. 2. That section 5 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from February 3, 1906."

With the following amendments:

In line 6, after the word "hereby," strike out the words "revived and reenacted."

In line 7, strike out the words "SEC. 2. That section 5 of said act is hereby."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the necessity for that?

Mr. WATKINS. It is to construct a bridge for the traffic across the Red River, which construction was delayed on account of the yellow fever last year.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. It has already been authorized?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; it has already been authorized and this is simply to extend the time. They have the right to build it, but they can not do it unless the time is extended.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, for the present I shall object.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the regular order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment respecting the eight-hour law on the Isthmus of Panama, on which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 120, nays 110, answered "present" 11, not voting 145, as follows:

Mr. LONGWORTH with Mr. GRANGER.

For one week:

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. GARBER.

Mr. WADSWORTH with Mr. BOWIE.

Until further notice:

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. HARDWICK.

Mr. CURTIS with Mr. LITTLE.

Mr. CRUMPACKER with Mr. ZENOR.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware with Mr. BELL of Georgia.

Mr. CROMER with Mr. PATTERSON of South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania with Mr. BROUSSARD.

Mr. GRAHAM with Mr. VAN DUZER.

Mr. HITT with Mr. HILL of Mississippi.

For the session:

Mr. BRADLEY with Mr. GOULDEN.

Mr. KNOPF with Mr. WEISSE.

Mr. MORRELL with Mr. SULLIVAN of New York.

Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania with Mr. PATTERSON of North Carolina.

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RUPPERT.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to change my vote from "no" to "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called Mr. GRIGGS's name and he answered "present."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I was standing here in the aisle and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman giving attention when his name was called or should have been called?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I can not say that positively, Mr. Speaker, but I was standing in the aisle expecting to hear my name.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman does not bring himself within the rule, unless he was present giving attention and did not hear his name called.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I had been listening quite a little bit for my name. I thought the Clerk was on the first call and was calling it regularly down and had skipped over me. I do not want to tell a story.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hardly thinks the gentleman comes within the rule.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I answer "present," Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that.

Mr. PATTERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania has voted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands he has not voted.

Mr. PATTERSON of North Carolina. Then I have a pair with him, and I would like to answer "present."

The Clerk called the name of Mr. PATTERSON of North Carolina, and he answered "present."

Mr. SAMUEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote. I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman giving attention?

Mr. SAMUEL. No, sir. I did not hear my name at all, though.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that a gentleman must be present and giving attention when his name was called, or should have been called, before he can, under the rule, vote. The reason of the rule is that perchance the Clerk may have omitted to call the gentleman's name.

Mr. SAMUEL. I would have voted "no."

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my name called. I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and giving attention when his name was called or should have been called?

Mr. MCNARY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. And did not hear it when it should have been called?

Mr. MCNARY. On the second roll call; I was not here on the first roll call.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called Mr. MCNARY's name, and he answered "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that matters on the Private Calendar relating to pensions under the rule be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that matters on the Private Calendar for consideration from the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:
